The swiftest gae his head a wap.

Lesson's Broad (Child's Ballads, II. 343).

wap² (wop), v. t. [< ME. wappen (also comp. atrappen, hirappen), lap or wrap, wrap up (perhaps confused with wappen, wloppen, wrap, lap); see wrap, lap³.] To wrap; tie; bind. Hall-twell.

wap² (wop), n. [Also wapp, wop; < wap², v.] 1. A bale or bundle, as of hay or straw. [Scotch and North, Eng.]—2. A shroud-stopper.—3. A pendant with a thimble in one end through which running rigging is led.

wap³ (wop), v. i. [< ME. wappen, bark; cf. wag¹ and gap.] To bark; yelp.

Wapping or barking as howlly. Prompt. Parv.

'Tis the little wapping of small dogs that stir up the cruel masters.

C. Mather, Discourse on Witchcraft (ed. 1689), p. 24.

wapacut (wop'a-kut), n. [NL, as specific name wapacuth; < Amer. Ind. (Cree) wapacuth, wap-paw-keetha (also wapahaw), a white owl; a name applied by Pennant and Latham to a kind of owl described in the manuscript notes of Mr. Hutchins, who resided on Severn river, near Hudson's Bay.] A large white spotted owl, about 2 feet long and without ear-tufts, believed to be the common snowy owl, Nyctale scandiaca. See ent under snow-owl.

wapen, n. An obsolete or dialectal form of weapon.

wapenshaw (wop'n-shā), n. [See, also wapenshaw, wapenschaw, etc., lit. 'weapon-show,' < wapen (a form of weapon) + shaw.] A show or review of persons under arms, formerly made at certain times in every district. These exhibitions or meetings were not designed for military exercises, but only to show that the lieges were properly provided with arms. The name has been revived in some quarters in Great Britain, and applied to the periodical gatherings of the volunteer corps of a more or less wide district for review, inspection, shooting competitions, etc. [Scotch.]

We went to the field of war,
And to the wapenshaw.

Up and War Them A', Wallo (Child's Ballads, VII. 265).

wapenshaw (wop'n-shā), v. i. To hold or attend a wapenshaw. [Scotch.]

wapenshawing (wop'n-shā-ing), n. [= D. wapenschouwing; as wapenshaw + -ing¹.] Same as wapenshaw.

But thir ridings and wapenshawings, my leddy, I hae nae na broon o' them ava. Scott, Old Mortality, vii.

wapentake (wop'n-tāk), n. [< ME. wapentake, wapentake, < AS. wapenstake, wapentac, a district, a wapentake (ML. wapentac or wapentagium), adapted from teal. rapmatac, < rapna, gen. pl. of rapin, a weapon (= AS. wapen = E. weapon), + -tak, a taking hold, a grasping, esp. a grasp in wrestling (used of the contact of weapons), < taka, take, grasp, seize, touch; see weapon and tak, and cf. wapenshaw.] Formerly, in certain counties of northern, eastern, and midland England, a division or subdivision of a shire, generally corresponding to a hundred in other counties. The term seems to have been originally applied to the armed assemblies of freemen; and there is possibly an allusion to a practice of taking up or 'touching' the arms. Wapentake is still a territorial division in Yorkshire.

It is written that King Alured, or Alfred, who then reigned, did divide the realm into shires, and the shires into hundrethes, and the hundrethes into rapes or wapen- takes, and the wapentakes into tithings. See that ten tithings made an hundreth, and five made a lathe or wapentake. Spenser, State of Ireland.

The wapentake is found only in the Anglian districts,
. . . To the north of these districts the shires are divided into wards, and to the south into hundreds. Hence the wapentake may be a relic of Scandinavian occupation.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 45.

wapiti (wop'i-ti), n. [Also wappiti, wapiti, wappiti; < Amer. Ind. (Cree) wapitik, 'white deer,' said to designate the Rocky Mountain goat, Haploceros montanus; used as E., and also in the NL, form Cervus wapiti, by B. S. Barton, in 1809, for the animal defined.] The North American stag or elk, Cervus canadensis, which is the North American representative of the stag or red deer of Europe, and resembles the latter, though it is much larger and of a stronger make, being one of the largest living representatives of the family Cervidae. Wapiti is chiefly a book-name of this deer, which has generally been known since about 1820 as the elk—a name applied in Europe to a very different animal, corresponding to that called moose in North America. (See elk [with cut], moose, stag.) The full-grown male wapiti may exceed a height of 16 hands at the withers, and acquire a weight of more than 1,000 pounds, though not averaging over 600; the form is short for its stature. The coat is some shade of yellowish-gray or brownish-gray, darkening to chestnut-brown on the head, neck, and limbs, even blackening on the belly; on the rump is a white patch bordered with black and extending into the groin; the tail is extremely short. The antlers are very long, with comparatively slender, cylindrical, and regularly curved beam, giving off in front the brow- and bez-antlers close together, the royal at end of first third of the beam, a large sur-royal at end of second third, and then forking dichotomously (only exceptionally acquiring any palmation like the crown of the European stag). A pair of good sized antlers may weigh, with the skull, 50 or 60 pounds, measure 4 or 5 feet along the curve of the beam, and spread 2 or 4 feet apart. The venison is well flavored and highly nutritious. The wapiti has inhabited North America from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from Mexico to about 57° in the interior; but it has been hunted out of nearly all its range, and is now found chiefly in the Rocky Mountain region of the United States, especially of the Upper Missouri and Yellowstone rivers. It is gregarious, goes in herds or droves sometimes of many hundreds, is slaughtered with little difficulty, and would soon become extinct were no measures taken for its preservation.

wappato (wop'a-tō), n. [Also wapaton; < Oregon Ind. wapato, wappato (?).] The tubers of Sagittaria variabilis. The Indians of Oregon use them as food.

wapper, v. An obsolete spelling of *wap*¹.

wappent, n. Same as wapen.

wappened, a. A spurious (or perhaps obscene) word occurring only in the following passage. It has been conjectured to be a misprint for wapping.

This yellow slave [gold]
Will knit and break religions. . . . This is it That makes the wappened widow wed again.

Shak., T. of A., iv. 3. 38.

But still he stole his face to set awry,
And wappering turned up his white of eye,
Mir. for Mags. (Imp. Dict.)

wapper-eyed (wap'ér-íd), a. [*< wapper + eye*¹ + -id.] Bleared-eyed; blinking.

A little wapper-eyed candidate, to wink and blink at small faults.
Middleton, Black Book, p. 528.

wapper-jaw (wap'ér-jā), n. 1. A wry mouth.
Hallucell. [Prov. Eng.] 2. A projecting under-jaw. [Colloq., U. S.]

wappet (wap'et), n. [*< wap*³.] A cur-dog.
Hallucell. [Prov. Eng.]

Wappineer (wop-i-nér'), n. [Var. of Wappinger* for Wappinger, q. v.] A man of Wapping, a district of London along the Thames, near the Tower.

In kennel sow'd o'er head and ears
Amongst the crowding Wappineers,

Wappineer tar, a werman from Wapping Old Stairs; hence, a fresh-water sailor; a lubber.

Flip, the Commadore, a most illiterate Wappineer Tar, hates the Gentleness of the Navy, gets drunk with his Boats-Crew, and values himself upon the British Management of the Navy.

C. Shadwell, Humours of the Navy. Dramatis Personæ.
Wappinger (wop'ing-ér), n. [*< Wapping + -er*¹.] A man of Wapping, London.

He was a thorough-paced traitor, and looked upon to be paymaster of the mob; a Wappinger and good at muster-ing seamen.
Roger North, Examen, p. 588. (Darley.)

wapplerite (wop'lér-it), n. A hydrated arsenate of calcium and magnesium, found at Joachimsthal in minute white crystals.

waps (wops), n. A dialectal variant of wasp.

war¹ (war), n. [Early mod. E. warre; < ME. wer, werre, werre, werre, were. < late AS.

werre (also cited in AL. as war*, in comp. war-scut). < OE. werre, guerre, F. guerra = Pr. guerra, gera = Sp. Pg. It. guerra, war, < ML. wer-ra, war, < OHG. werre, vexation, strife, controversy, confusion, broil (= MD. werre = MLG. werre, strife, war, hostility). < weran (fir-weran), MHG. werren (ver-werren), G. werren (cer-werren), confuse, entangle, embroil, = MD. werren (ver-werren), embroil, entangle; akin to E. worse: see worse, and cf. *war*², ult. a var. of worse. The F. guerre appears in the phrase nom de guerre, and the Sp. in the dim. guerrilla. [Hence *war*¹, v., warrag, warrior, etc.] 1. A contest between nations or states (international war), or between parties in the same state (civil war), carried on by force of arms. International or public war is always understood to be authorized by the sovereign powers of the nations engaged in it; when it is carried into the territories of the antagonist it is called an aggressive or offensive war, and when carried on to resist such aggression it is called defensive. Certain usages or rights of war have come to be generally recognized and defined under the name of the Laws of War, which in general (but subject to some humane restrictions which in recent times have been greatly increased) permit the destruction or capture of armed enemies, the destruction of property likely to be serviceable to them, the stoppage of all their channels of traffic, and the appropriation of everything in an enemy's country necessary for the support and subsistence of the invading army. On the other hand, though an enemy may be starved into surrender, wounding, except in battle, mutilation, and all cruel and wanton devastation are contrary to the usages of war, as are also bombarding an unprotected town, the use of poison in any way, and torture to extort information from an enemy; but it is admitted that an enemy may be put to death for certain acts which are in themselves not criminal, and it may be even highly patriotic and praiseworthy, but are injurious to the invaders, such as firing on the invaders although not regularly enrolled in an organized military force, or seeking to impair the invaders' lines of communication.

"After this werre," quod she, "God send vs pece."

Geometres (E. E. T. S.), l. 900.

Learning and art, and especially religion, weave ties that make war look like fratricide, as it is.

warble³ (wâr'bl), n. [Also wormit, wormul, warnle, wornul, wornul, also assimilated warble, and dim. warblet; cf. equiv. warbeetle, and the adj. warbitten, said of timber pierced by the larvae of insects; orig. form uncertain, no early instances appearing; perhaps connected with ME. war, pos. humor. Some of the forms indicate simulation of worm.] 1. A small, hard swelling on the back of a horse, produced by the galling of the saddle. — 2. A tumor on the back of cattle or deer, produced by the larva of a bot-fly or gadfly. — 3. An insect or its larva which produces warbles. Also warbeetle. Compare *wabble*².

warble-fly (wâr'bl-flî), n. A fly whose larva produces warbles. Thus, Hypodamia boris is the warble-fly of the ox. Synonymous in part with bot-fly. The latter word, however, is applied to all Estridae.

warbler (wâr'blîr), n. [*warbl*¹ + -er.] 1. One who or that which warbles; a singer; a songster.

In lulling strains the feathered warblers woo.

Tickell, On Hunting.

Dan Chaucer, the first warbler. Tennyson, Fair Women.

2. Specifically, any one of a great number of small oscine passerine birds, or dentostrual inosessorial birds, of different families and many different genera, of both the Old World and the New. Especially — (a) A bird of the group composing the family Sylviidae, or Old World warblers, with scarcely any representatives in America. This is one of the most extensive and varied groups of its grade in ornithology, now generally rated as only a subfamily (Sylviinae) of Troglodytidae. These warblers are all small, active, sprightly birds, and many are remarkable for the clearness, sweetness, and flexibility of their song. Among typical warblers of the subfamily Sylviinae may be noted the species of Sylvia, the leafing-greens, as the blackcap and whitethroat; of Melospiza, as the Bartford warbler; of Regulus, as the goldcrest; of Phylloscopus, as the willow-warbler; of Aedon, as the Rufous warbler; of Hypodamia, as the icterine warbler; of Aeronautes, as the reed- or sedge-warbler; of Lanius, as the grasshopper-warbler; of Cettia, as Cetti's warbler. Besides these, the accentor or hedge-sparrow, the nightingale (Luscinia luscinia), the redstart (Erithacus rubecula), the linnet, the redstart, whinchat, stonechat, etc., have been brought under the definition of warbler, as members of the sylvine group. (b) In the United States, a bird of a different family, the American warblers, Dendroica or Mniotiltidae, a smaller and more compact group than the Sylviidae, though the species are still very numerous and diversified. Few of them are noted for musical ability. The leading representatives of the American warblers are the numerous wood-warblers of the genus Dendroica; the worm-eating warblers, Helminthophaga; the creepers, Parula; the ground-warblers, as Geothlypis; the chat, Icteria; the water-thrushes, Seiurus; the flycatching warblers, Myiodynastes, Scelophaea, and many others of tropical America.

3. In bagpipe music, an appoggiatura, or similar melodic embellishment.

In the music performed upon this instrument [the bagpipe] the players introduce among the simple notes of the tune a kind of appoggiatura, consisting of a great number of rapid notes of peculiar embellishment, which they term warblers. Encyc. Brit., III. 235.

Adelaide's warbler, Dendroica adalaidae (Baird, 1865), the representative in Porto Rico of Grace's and of the yellow-throated warbler. — African warbler (Latham, 1783), the type species of the genus Sphenocercus, S. africanus. Also called spotted yellow flycatcher by Latham, formerly Muscivora affra, Motacilla or Sylvia africana, etc., and also placed in the genus Drymonia by some authors. — Alpine warbler (Latham, 1783), a kind of hedge-warbler, Acanthopneuste of central and southern Europe, occasionally found in Great Britain. This bird was also called coloured star by Latham the same year, having been described by Scopoli in 1769 as Sturnus collaris. — Aquatic warbler (Latham, 1783), one of the reed-warblers, probably Aeronautes aquaticus; formerly called Sylvia or Salicaria or Calamagrostis aquatica. — Audubon's warbler, Dendroica auduboni, the western representative of the yellow-rumped or myrtle-bird, and equally abundant. It differs chiefly in having the throat yellow instead of white. Also called western yellow-rump. — Autumnal warbler, the young of the bay-breasted warbler, mistaken for a distinct species. J. Wilson, 1811. — Azure warbler, the cerulean warbler. — Babbling warbler (Latham, 1783), the lesser whitethroat, Sylvia curruca. See whitethroat. — Bachman's warbler (named after the American naturalist John Bachman (1790-1871), Helminthophaga bachmani of the southern United States and some of the West Indies. (Audubon, 1834.) It is one of the swamp-warblers, and still very rare, though it has been quite recently found to be common in some localities. — Barred warbler, Sylvia nisoria of Europe, Asia, and Africa. — Bay-breasted warbler, Dendroica castanea of eastern parts of North America. The adult male has the whole breast chestnut. — Belted warbler, the yellow-rumped warbler. Latham, 1783; Pennant, 1785. — Black-and-white warbler, the creeping warbler, Mniotiltia varia; more fully called black-and-white creeping warbler or creeping, also white-poll warbler. See cut under Mniotiltia. — Black-and-yellow warbler, Dendroica maculosa. See cut under spotted. — Blackburnian warbler, Dendroica blackburni, the promethean warbler, in adult plumage extensively black varied with white, the breast and some parts about the head of a flaming orange. It is the most richly colored of the warblers, and is common in many parts of North America. It was named by Latham in 1783 after a Mrs. Blackburn of London. — Black-capped warbler, the blackcap, Sylvia (tortrix) curruca of nearly all Europe, and parts of Asia and Africa. — Black-headed warbler, the American redstart, Setophaga ruticilla. See cut under redstart. Latham, 1783; Pennant, 1785. — Black-poll warbler, Dendroica striata, when adult having the whole crown black, the upper parts olivaceous streaked with black, and the under parts white streaked with black along the sides. In young plumage it is hardly to be distinguished from the bay-breasted warbler. It is very wide-ranging, from Greenland and Alaska through most of America (probably to Chili). It was originally described in 1772 by J. R. Forster from Hudson's Bay as the striped fly- catcher. — Black-throated blue warbler, Dendroica cerulea, of eastern North America, remarkable for the unusual difference of the sexes in plumage. The male is blue, white below, with black throat and a peculiar white space on the wing; the female is chiefly greenish above and yellowish below, with traces of the characteristic wing-mark. — Black-throated gray warbler, Dendroica agriosa, of western parts of the United States and Mexico. The adult male is blue-ash above with a few black streaks, below white streaked on the sides with black, the head black with white stripes and a small bright yellow spot below the eye. — Black-throated green warbler, Dendroica virens, one of the most abundant wood-warblers of eastern North America. The adult male is olivaceous green above, below extensively black, with much golden yellow on the sides of the head, and white on the wings and tail. The length is 5 inches. It is one of a group of warblers having several representatives in western North America. See cut under Dendroica. — Black-throated warbler, the black-throated blue warbler. Latham, 1783; Pennant, 1785. — Blanford's warbler, Sylvia blanfordi, of which only one specimen is known from Abyssinia. — Bloody-side or bloody-sided warbler. (a) The chestnut-sided warbler. Pennant, 1785. (b) One of the golden warblers, Dendroica cerulea, of the West Indies. Latham, 1783. — Blue-eyed yellow warbler, the summer yellow-bird, Dendroica aestiva. — Blue golden-winged warbler, Helminthophaga chrysopetra, a common swamp-warbler of the eastern United States and Canada. See cut under Helminthophaga. — Blue-green warbler, the cerulean warbler in immature plumage, or the female of that species. — Blue mountain warbler, an American warbler so named by A. Wilson in 1812, and never since identified. It was found in the Blue Mountains of Pennsylvania. — Blue-throated warbler (Latham, 1783), the bluetthroat, originally described by Edwards in 1743 as the bluetthroat redstart, later variously called Motacilla surciva, Sylvia surciva, Sylvia canescens, Cyanocitta surciva, etc., all of which names are shared by a related species or variety. See cut under bluetthroat. — Blue-winged yellow warbler, Helminthophaga pumila, a common swamp-warbler of the eastern parts of the United States, originally described by Edwards (before Linnaeus) as the pinereverer. — Blue yellow-backed warbler, Parula (or Compsothlypis) americana. See Parula. — Bonaparte's fly-catching warbler, the young of the Canadian fly-catching warbler, mistaken by Audubon for a different species in 1831, and dedicated to Prince Charles Lucien Bonaparte (1803-57). — Booted warbler, a tree-warbler, Myiodynastes caligata. — Bourbon warbler (Latham, 1783), the yellow-rumped creeper (Latham, 1781); a white-eye or silver-eye, Zosterops lateralis, peculiar to the island of Réunion. — Bowman's warbler, Sylvia nautica of Persia, Palestine, and Abyssinia. — Bush-warblers, the members of the genus Cettia, having only ten rectrices. There are about 12 species, with one exception confined to Asia. The exception is Cetti's warbler, C. cetti, which extends throughout the Mediterranean region, and was originally described in 1776, by the naturalist whose name it bears, as seignioria di juncus, which became the biscarole of Binton and Daubenton. See cut under Cettia. — Caffarian warbler (Latham, 1783), the so-called red-tailed thrush of Latham (1783), formerly Motacilla or Sylvia caffra, now known as Cossyphus caffra (and Bonasaornia phoeniceus). — Canadian fly-catching warbler, Myiodynastes canadensis, abundant in eastern parts of North America. Also called Canada and spotted flycatcher. The upper parts are bluish-ash varied with black, and the under parts are yellow with black streaks on the breast. — Canadian warbler. (a) The black-throated blue warbler. (b) The Canadian fly-catching warbler. — Cape May warbler, Dendroica tipica, formerly Sylvia maritima; so named by A. Wilson, in 1812, from a locality in New Jersey where he found it. In full plumage it is one of the handsomest of the wood-warblers, and has peculiarities which have caused a genus (Trichospiza) to be based upon it. — Caribbean warbler, an American warbler so named by Audubon in 1831, and never since identified. More fully called carolinensis or carolinensis, also dusky warbler. — Cerulean warbler. See cerulean. — Cetti's warbler, one of the bush-warblers. — Chestnut-bellied warbler (Latham, 1783), an Asiatic redstart, Anticitta (formerly Sylvia erythronotus). — Chestnut-sided warbler, Dendroica pensilvanica of the eastern United States and Canada, having, when adult, the under parts pure white with a chain of chestnut streaks along each side, and the crown rich yellow. — Chiff-chaff warbler, Phylloscopus colaptes. See cut under chiff-chaff. — Children's warbler, the female or young summer yellow-bird, Dendroica aestiva. Audubon, 1831. — Clingale warbler (Latham, 1783), the green warbler of Brown (1776) and yellow-bellied creeper of Latham (1787), one of the Acrocephalus, Anthracoceros phoeniceus, extending from Bhutan to Malacca and the Sunda Islands, but not known in Ceylon. — Cisticoline warbler, a grass-warbler; one of a very large and loose group of Old World warbler-like birds, of which the leading genera, in numbers of species, are Cisticola or Prunella, with twelve rectrices, and Prinia with ten (as in the genus Cettia). The group is badly defined, and is now generally thrown into the so-called ornithological waste-basket (Troglodytidae). Most of the species of the three genera named have been placed in each of the others, and Drymonia has practically included the members of both. Among notable members of the group are the tailor-warblers or tailor birds (see Orthotomus, Sutoria, and tailor-bird, with cuts), with twelve rectrices, and the species of Sitta (which see), with ten rectrices. The group is best developed in Africa and Asia. Cisticola cuneatus (with thirty technical synonyms) extends from southern Europe, throughout Africa and through the warmer parts of Asia, to the Indo-Malayan islands; C. subcapitata (with more than thirty synonyms) inhabits most of Africa. — Citrine warbler (Latham, 1783), the remarkable New Zealand Acrocephalus chloris. See warbler. — Citron warbler, the summer yellow-bird, Dendroica aestiva, Swainson and Richardson, 1831. — Connecticut warbler, Opornis agilis, a ground warbler so named by Wilson in 1812, common in eastern parts of the United States, especially in the fall. — Creeping warblers, the American warblers of the genera Mniotiltia and Parula. See cut under Mniotiltia. — Dartford warbler (Latham, 1783), the Motacilla umbra of Boddaert, 1753 (based on the pittechou of Daubenton, Planches Enluminées, 665, the 1, 1789), also called Sylvia provincialis, S. undata, S. dactyloctenarius, S. terrigena, etc., and type of the genus Melospiza (which see, with cut), a warbler found from England and France to northern Africa and Palestine. — Daurian warbler (Latham, 1783), the Daurian redstart, Luscinia (formerly Sylvia) aurora, inhabiting most of Asia and some of the adjacent islands. — Desert-warbler, Sylvia nana, characteristic of arid wastes from Algeria to Persia and other parts of Asia. — Dusky warbler. (a) A bird so named by Latham in 1783, but never identified. It is supposed to be a species of Prinia or of Dryanura. (b) The yellow-rumped warbler. Pennant, 1785. Also ambrase warbler. (c) The carbonated warbler. Nuttall, 1832. — Dwarf warbler (Latham, 1783), Acanthiza pusilla, a warbler-like bird of Australia. — Equinoctial warbler (Latham, 1783), Turdus aequinoctialis, of Christmas Island in the Pacific Ocean. This is closely related to the bird figured under Turdus. — Fat warbler. Same as grasset warbler. — Flaxen warbler, a bird so named by Latham in 1783, apparently Prinia mustacea. — Fly-catching warblers, the American warblers of the subfamily Setophaginae, as the redstart, the species of Myiodynastes, Cardellina, Basileuterus, etc., chiefly of tropical and subtropical regions. See cuts under Myiodynastes and redstart. — Garden warbler, the common European and African Sylvia hortensis, the greater pettichaps. See cut under pettichaps. — Golden-cheeked warbler, Dendroica chrysoparia, a relative of the black-throated green warbler, found from Texas to Guatemala. Sclater and Salvin, 1860. — Golden-crowned warbler, the yellow-rumped warbler. Latham, 1783; Pennant, 1785. Also golden crowned flycatcher (the original name, bestowed by Edwards). — Golden swamp-warbler, the prothonotary warbler. See cut under prothonotary. — Golden warblers. See golden. — Gold-wing, gold-winged, or golden-winged warbler, Helminthophaga chrysoparia. See cut under Helminthophaga. — Grace's warbler, Dendroica gracia [named by S. F. Baird in 1865 after Grace D. Cones], a wood-warbler resembling D. dominica, discovered in Arizona by Cones in 1864. — Grasset warbler, the yellow-rumped warbler. Latham, 1783; Pennant, 1785. — Grass-warbler. (a) A cisticoleine warbler, especially one of the genus Dryanura in a broad sense. (b) Any member of the genus Luscinia, a small group of about 12 species, chiefly Asiatic, and especially Hindustani, with one species extending into the Mediterranean region, and another in South Africa. There are twelve tail-feathers, the tarsus is scutellate, the wings are short with spurious first primary, and the prevailing colors are russet and olive-brown. The type is L. aedon (of Pallas). This genus has six other New Latin names. — Great-tailed warbler (Latham, 1783), one of the South African grass-warblers, formerly Sylvia nattervi, now known as Prinia (or Dryanura) nattervi. — Green black-capped warbler, Wilson's fly-catching warbler. Nuttall. — Green warbler. (a) The Cingalese warbler. Bruen, 1776. (b) The black-throated green warbler. Latham, 1783; Pennant, 1785. — Ground-warblers, the American warblers of the genera Geothlypis and related forms, as the Maryland yellowthroat. See cut under Geothlypis. — Guira warbler (Latham), a South American tanager, Neotoma guira. — Hedge-warbler, the hedge-sparrow (of Albin, 1738), Acrocorax undulatus. See cut under Acrocorax. Latham, 1783. — Hemlock-warbler, the young Blackburnian warbler, Sylvia parvus of Wilson, Nuttall, and Audubon. — Hooded warbler, the hooded fly-catching warbler, Myiodynastes nigratus, of the eastern parts of the United States. The adult male is of an olivaceous color above, rich-yellow below, the head mostly black with a mask of rich yellow. Also called nutcracker warbler, Selby's sylvan flycatcher, and hooded titmouse. — Icteric warbler, a tree-warbler, Myiophobus ictericus. — Jamaica warbler, Dendroica dominica, the yellow-throated warbler. Latham, 1783. — Kentucky warbler, Oporornis formosa, a ground-warbler so named by Wilson in 1811. It is entirely rich-yellow underneath, olivaceous above, with a black bar on each side of the head, and a yellow mark about the eye. It is common in eastern parts of the United States. More fully called by Audubon Kentucky fly-catching warbler. — Kirtland's warbler, Dendroica kirtlandi, a rare wood-warbler named in 1852 by S. F. Baird after Dr. Jared P. Kirtland of Ohio, where the bird was discovered, at Cleveland, May, 1851. — Lawrence's warbler [named after George N. Lawrence of New York], Helminthophaga lawrencei, Herrick, 1874. — Long-legged warbler (Latham, 1783), the remarkable New Zealand Vireoniscus longipes. See Vireoniscus. — Long-tailed warbler (Latham, 1783), the tail-warbler or tailor-bird. See Saturia. — Louisiana warbler, the blue yellow-backed warbler. Latham, 1783; Pennant, 1785. — Lucy's warbler [named after the daughter of S. F. Baird], Helminthophaga luciae, of Arizona. J. G. Cooper, 1862. It is clear-ashy, white below, with chestnut crown-patch and upper tail-coverts. — Macgillivray's warbler, Geothlypis macgillivrayi, the western representative of the mourning warbler, more fully called Macgillivray's ground warbler; originally described by Audubon in 1827, and dedicated to William Macgillivray, a Scotch ornithologist, who wrote most of the technical parts of Audubon's "Ornithological Biography" and "Birds of America". — Magellanic warbler (Latham, 1783), a South American rock-wren, Scolecophagus magellanicus, of the family Phoenicogaster. See cut under Setophaga. — Magnolia warbler, the black-and-yellow warbler, described as Sylvia americana by A. Wilson in 1811. — Marmora's warbler, Sylvia marmora or Melospiza marmora, of the Mediterranean region. — Marsh-warbler, one of the reed-warblers, Acrocephalus palustris, of parts of Europe, Asia, and Africa. — Maryland warbler, the Maryland yellowthroat. See cut under Geothlypis. — Maurice warbler (Latham, 1783), the white eye or silver eye of Mauritius, Zosterops mauritiana. — Mitered warbler, the hooded warbler. Also called nutcracker sylvan flycatcher. — Moor warbler, Pratincola (formerly Sylvia) maura, a whinchat widely distributed in Asia. — Mourning warbler, Geothlypis philadelphia, so named by A. Wilson in 1810 from the black veiled with gray on the breast, as if the bird were wearing crape. It is a common ground-warbler of many parts of North America. — Nashville warbler, Helminthophaga rubicapilla, a common swamp-warbler or worm-eating warbler of most parts of North America, discovered by A. Wilson in 1811, and named after a city in Tennessee. — New York warbler, the New York water-thrush, Seiurus nuchaboracensis. See cut under Seiurus. Latham, 1783; Pennant, 1785. — Olive warbler. (a) A monotypic American warbler named Sylvia olivacea by J. P. Girard in 1811; Pentacranus olivaceus of Coles, inhabiting Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and southward, chiefly of an olivaceous color with orange-brown or deep saffron-yellow head and neck, and a black transocular bar. It is 4½ inches long. Also olive-backed and orange-breasted warbler. (b) The female of the black-throated blue warbler. P. H. Gosse, [Jamaica]. (c) The summer yellow-bird, Dendroica aestiva, in some obscure plumage. Pennant, 1785; Stephens, 1817. — Orange-breasted warbler. Same as olive warbler (a). — Orange-crowned warbler, Helminthophaga celata, named by Thomas Say (1823). It inhabits all of North America, and several varieties are described. The crown has a concealed patch of orange. — Orange-thighed warbler, the Maryland yellowthroat, which in some autumnal and other plumages has the flanks tinged with orange-brown. The adult male is figured under Geothlypis. Pennant, 1785. — Orange-throated warbler. (a) The prothonotary warbler. See cut under prothonotary. Latham, 1783. (b) The Blackburnian warbler. — Orphean warbler, Sylvia orpheus, which, including its variety S. jerdoni, inhabits most of Europe and much of Asia and Africa. — Palestine warbler, Sylvia melanocephala, of Palestine and Cyprus. — Party-colored warbler. (a) The blue yellow-backed warbler. (b) The prairie-warbler. Stephens, 1817. — Pensile warbler, Dendroica dominica, formerly Sylvia pusilla. Latham, 1783. — Pine-creeping warbler, Dendroica pinus or virgata, one of the commonest wood-warblers of the United States, of an olivaceous color above and yellowish below. — Pine-swamp warbler, the black-throated blue warbler. — Pine-warbler, one of two different American warblers: (a) The pine-creeper of Edwards, and not of Catesby; the blue-winged yellow warbler, Helminthophaga pinus. Latham, 1783; Pennant, 1785. (b) The pine-creeper of Catesby, 1771; the pine-creeping warbler, Dendroica pinus or virgata. See cut under pine-warbler. — Prothonotary warbler. See prothonotary. — Provincial warbler, the Dartford warbler. — Quebec warbler, the chestnut-sided warbler. Pennant, 1785. — Rathbone's warbler, the summer yellow-bird, Dendroica aestiva, in some immature plumage. Audubon. — Red-backed warbler, the prairie-warbler. P. H. Gosse, [Jamaica]. — Red-faced or red-fronted warbler, Cardellina rubrifrons, a fly-catching warbler of the southern border of the United States and southward. See Cardellina. — Redstart warbler, the European redstart, Ruticilla (formerly Sylvia) phoeniceus. See cut under redstart. — Red-throated warbler, the chestnut-sided warbler. Latham, 1783. — Rocky Mountain warbler, Virginia's warbler. — Roscoe's warbler, the Maryland yellowthroat, in some variant plumage. Audubon, 1832. — Ruddy warbler, the rock-warbler. Latham, 1801. — Rufous-vented warbler (Latham, 1801), an Australian thick-headed shrike, Pachycephala rufiventris, earlier called by Latham rufous-vented honey-eater, and later by Lewin orange-breasted thrush. — Rufous warbler, Sylvia (or Aedon) indulcoratus, of southern Europe and northern Africa. — Rüppell's warbler, Sylvia rüppelli, of southern Europe, Asia Minor, Palestine, and some parts of Africa. — Rush-warbler (Latham, 1783), an unidentified sparrow of the United States, supposed to be the field-sparrow, Spizella pusilla. — Rusty-sided warbler (Latham, 1801), the cerulean creeper of the same author and date, Zosterops ceruleus, a white-eye of Australia, New Zealand, and the Chatham Islands. — St. Domingo warbler, Dendroica dominica, the yellow-throated warbler. Turbin, 1806. — Sardinian warbler, Sylvia melanocephala, of the Mediterranean region. — Sennett's warbler [named after George R. Sennett of New York], one of the creeping warblers, Parula nigra, of Texas and southward. Coates, 1877. — Siberian warbler (Latham, 1783), the Asiatic Acrocorax montanellus, occasional in Europe, related to the common hedge-acrocorax. — Spectacled warbler, Sylvia conspicillata, of the Mediterranean region, extending from Palestine to the Canaries. — Spotted warbler. (a) The Cape May warbler. (b) The black-and-yellow warbler, Dendroica maculosa. See spotted (with cut). — Spotted yellow warbler. (a) The Cape May warbler. Latham, 1783; Pennant, 1785. These two accounts are the bases of Motacilla tigrina (Gmelin, 1788). (b) Dendroica maculosa. See cut under spotted. — Streaked warbler (Latham, 1801), an Australian warbler like bird, formerly Sylvia sagittata, now known as Othonocheila sagittata. — Subalpine warbler, Sylvia subalpina, of southern Europe, northern Africa, and western Asia. — Summer warbler, the summer yellow-bird of North America; one of the golden warblers, Dendroica aestiva, among the most abundant and blent, either one of two different malurine birds of Australia, Malurus cyaneus and M. lamberti, formerly placed in the genus Sylvia. Latham; Sharr. Also called blue-creen. — Swainson's warbler [named after William Swainson, an English quarian naturalist], Helminthia (or Helonura) swainsoni, described by Audubon in 1834, and long considered one of the rarest of the American warblers, but lately found abundant in South Carolina. — Sybil warbler, Pratincola (formerly Sylvia) sybil, peculiar to Madagascar. — Sylvan warblers, the American fly-catching warblers of the genus Myiodynastes; so called as pertaining to Nuttall's genus Sylvania (1840). See cut under Myiodynastes. — Tennessee warbler, Helminthophaga peregrina, a common swamp-warbler of chiefly eastern parts of North America; named after the State where found by A. Wilson in 1811. — Tollmie's warbler, Macgillivray's warbler. J. K. Townsend, 1839. — Townsend's warbler, Dendroica townsendi, the western representative of the black-throated green warbler, discovered by Townsend and Nuttall on the Columbia river in 1835, and named after the former by Audubon. It ranges from Alaska to Guatemala, and has been taken near Philadelphia. — Tristram's warbler [named after Canon H. B. Tristram of England], Sylvia deserticola, of the Algerian Sahara. — Umbrose warbler. Same as dusky warbler (b). Latham, 1783. — Undated warbler, a bird so named by Latham in 1783, apparently a species of Cisticola. — Vigors's warbler [named after N. A. Vigors, an English quarian naturalist], the pine-creeping warbler as mistaken for another species. Audubon, 1832. Also called Vigors's circo (Nuttall, 1832). — Virginia warbler, Helminthophaga virginiae; so named by Baird in 1860 after the wife of Dr. W. W. Anderson; the Rocky Mountain warbler. — Western warbler, the hermit-warbler, discovered by J. K. Townsend at Fort Vancouver, May 28th, 1835, and by Thomas Nuttall at about the same time. — White-eyed warbler (Latham, 1783), the white-eye of Madagascar, Zosterops madagascariensis. — White-poll warbler, the black-and-white warbler. Latham, 1783; Pennant, 1785. — White-throated blue warbler, the cerulean warbler. — White-throated warbler, Helminthophaga leucobrouchealis. W. Brewster, 1874. — Wilson's fly-catching warbler [named after Alexander Wilson (1766-1813), the American ornithologist], Myiodynastes pusillus, inhabiting all parts of North America; more fully called Wilson's green black-capped fly-catching warbler, and formerly Sylvia wilsonii (Bonaparte, 1824). It is olivaceous and yellow, having in the adult male a square patch of glossy black on the crown. See cut under Myiodynastes. — Worm-eating warbler. See worm-eating. — Yellow-backed warbler, the blue yellow-backed warbler. Latham, 1783. — Yellow-breast or yellow-breasted warbler, the Maryland yellowthroat, Geothlypis trichas. See cut under Geothlypis. Latham, 1783; Pennant, 1785. — Yellow-browed warbler (Latham, 1783), Phylloscopus superciliosus (formerly Sylvia superciliosus), a common warbler throughout the greater part of Asia, and a straggler in Europe. Called in full the yellow-browed barred willow-warbler. See cut under Phylloscopus. — Yellow-crowned warbler, the chestnut-sided warbler, one of whose early names was Sylvia icteroccephala. Stephens, 1817. — Yellow-fronted warbler, the blue golden-winged warbler. Latham, 1783; Pennant, 1785. See cut under Helminthophaga. — Yellow-poll warbler, the summer yellow-bird, Dendroica aestiva. Latham, 1783; Pennant, 1785. — Yellow red-poll warbler. Same as palm-warbler. — Yellow-rumped warbler. (a) Dendroica coronata, the myrtle-bird (which see) or yellowrump, which abounds in most parts of North America, and has a host of names. It may be recognized by the distinct yellow marks in four places—on the crown, rump, and each side of the breast—the plumage being otherwise chiefly black, white, and bluish-gray when adult, but dingy in the young birds. Also golden-crowned, belted, dusky, umbrose, grasset, etc., warbler, Virginia titmouse, etc. (b) The black-and-yellow warbler, Dendroica maculosa, which has yellow upper tail-coverts like the preceding, but is otherwise quite different. sus (vert-tus*), which is postposed in the same way, < vertere, turn, become, = AS. weorðan, become; see ward¹ and vers¹. Cf. -wards.] A suffix of Anglo-Saxon origin, indicating direction or tendency to or from a point. It is advised to many adverbs and prepositions, as fore (for-), forth, from (fro-), to, after, back, hind, in, out, hither, thither, whither, up, alther, thence, etc.; to words indicating points of the compass (east, west, etc.); to nouns indicating a goal, center, end, direction, etc., as home, way, wind, down, heaven, God, etc. With some of these it was used pleonastically, as abackward, aboward. Most of the forms have a collateral form with adverbial genitive

-s, as forwards, afterwards, inwards, outwards, etc. In toward, the elements were formerly often separated, as in the Bible: to us-ward (Ps. xl. 5; 2 Pet. iii. 9); to thee-ward (1 Sam. xix. 4); to you-ward (2 Cor. xiii. 3); to the mercy seated-ward (Ex. xxxvii. 9); etc.

warden² (wår'dn), n. [< ME. wardan, wardone; usually associated with warden¹, and taken to mean a pear that may be kept long (cf. OF.
poire de garde, "a warden, or winter pear, a pear which may be kept verie long," Cotgrave):

see *warden*¹. But the sense of warden is active, 'one who keeps,' and it does not seem to apply to a pear; and the ME. forms of *warden*¹ are different from those of *warden*². Perhaps the origin is in OF. wardon*, a var. of garden (Godefroy), a var. of garden, garden; see garden.] A kind of pear, used chiefly for roasting or baking.

Bekker and Webster, Northward Ho, v. 1.

Who but a fool would have faith in a tradesman's ware or his word?

Tennyson, Maud, vii.

2. A collective noun used generally in composition with the name of the material, or a term relating to the characters of the articles or the use to which they are put: as, china-ware, tinware, hardware, tableware. — Adams's ware, in ceram., a fine English pottery made at Tunstall, at the end of the eighteenth century, by William Adams, a pupil of Wedgwood. The pieces are often close imitations of the Wedgwood ware. — Agen ware. (a) An inferior kind of Roman pottery, softer and coarser than Samian ware; so called from Agen in the department of Lot-et-Garonne, France, where much of this ware was found with the furnaces. (b) A decorative pottery made in the seventeenth century, many of the pieces having the forms of animals. Bronquart. — Apulian ware. See Apulian pottery (under Apulian), and cut under stannos. — Aretine ware. See Aretine. — Awata ware, pottery and porcelain made at Awata, near Kioto, Japan. The greater number of the pieces known to be of this manufacture are of yellowish hard paste, with a cracked glaze as if in imitation of Satsuma ware; but a curious and beautiful imitation of old Delft and a thin porcelain of a peculiar grayish white are known. — Bamboo ware, a variety of Wedgwood ware; so named from its color, and otherwise known as cane-colored ware. — Basalt ware. See basalt. — Benares ware, a name given to a kind of ornamental metal-work made in India, in which a pattern is produced by chasing or in other ways depressing the surface of the metal. — Black ware. Same as basalt ware. — Blue jasper ware, a name given to a blue-glazed pottery of modern manufacture, especially that made at the Ferrybridge factory. — Böttger ware. (a) A fine stoneware varying from red to dark brown, and approaching black, produced by the chemist J. F. Bottger about 1708-9 in the course of his experiments in the search for porcelain. (b) The first real or kaolinic porcelain produced in Europe: it was first made by Bottger about 1710. — Bristol Delft ware, an enameled pottery made at Bristol throughout the eighteenth century, especially a highly decorated ware in which landscapes, figure-subjects, etc., covering the whole dish, bottom and marly alike, and plates or dishes closely imitated from Chinese enameled porcelain, are included. This decorative Delft has not been manufactured since 1788. See Jewitt. — Bristol ware. Same as double-glazed ware. — Caffagiolo ware, a variety of the Italian enameled and painted earthenware known as majolica. It was made in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries at a factory belonging to the family of the Medici in the village of Caffagiolo, on the road between Florence and Bologna. The name is also spelled, according to the irregular orthography of the time, Cafagiolo, Caffagiolo, Caffagiolo, Caffagiolo. The marks of this factory are much varied, but generally include the words in Caffagiolo variously spelled. A characteristic mark of these wares is the free use of a dark but extremely brilliant blue often in large masses, also a brilliant but opaque orange, and an opaque Indian red. Metallic luster was early used at Caffagiolo. — Canton lacquer-ware. See lacquer-ware. — Cashan ware. Same as Kashee ware. Fortnum, S. K. Handbook, Majolica. — Castelli ware, pottery made at Castelli, in eastern Italy; specifically, an enameled and richly decorated pottery made during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries and even later. This magnificent ware preserves some of the characteristics of majolica, but is more pictorial in its decoration, being painted with landscapes, mythological scenes, etc. The colors are often heightened with gold. — Cologne ware, a name commonly given to the hard stoneware of which ornamental jugs, tankards, etc., were made, especially in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and formerly called grès de Flandres. The city of Cologne was the chief seat of this manufacture. Compare grès de Flandres (under grès) and stoneware. — Combed ware. See combed. — Coralline ware. See coralline. — Cracked ware. See cracked. — Cream-colored ware, pottery or stoneware having a cream-colored paste; specifically, a variety of the fine table-ware made by Wedgwood in the latter part of the eighteenth century. This ware was afterward called queen's-ware, from the supposed preference of Queen Charlotte, wife of George III. The cream-colored ware or queen's-ware made by other potters was copied closely from that of Wedgwood. — Crystalline ware. See crystalline. — Cullen ware, a Cologne ware. — Delft ware. (a) Pottery made in and near the town of Delft in Holland; specifically, pieces for table use, and decorated vases for the mold from within, and worked over with a sponge so as to give it the required thickness and a smooth inner surface. — Incised ware, pottery decorated by scratches upon the surface. Specifically: (a) A coarse earthenware covered with an outer coat of a different color, which, being deeply scratched, shows the body of the ware. (b) A kind of pottery in which the body is scratched or scored, the whole being then covered with a transparent glaze, which shows a deeper color where it fills these incisions than elsewhere. — India ware, a name inaccurately given in England to the more common varieties of Chinese and Japanese porcelains imported into Europe by the East India Company or otherwise. — Kashee ware, a fine ceramic ware made in Persia, and decorated in blue on white in a manner closely resembling Chinese porcelain. It is apparently a mixed or hybrid porcelain, as it is softer than Oriental porcelain, and evidently different from the soft or tender porcelain of Europe. Also called Kashan, Cashan, and Kachy ware. — Kioto ware, ceramic ware made in or near the city of Kioto in Japan. Immense quantities of pottery and porcelain are made there, and many characteristic varieties are imitated with great success; but the name is given especially to a hard yellow ware with cracked glaze peculiar to Japan. — Lapis-lazuli ware. See lapis. — Lava ware. See lava. — Old Fulham ware, a name given to the English imitations of German grès ceramic or hard stoneware made at Fulham from about 1670. — Palissy ware, a peculiar kind of pottery, remarkable for its beautiful glaze, the ornamentation being in very high relief, and consisting frequently of models of fish, reptiles, shells, or leaves. Bernard Palissy, a French potter of the sixteenth century, was the designer of this ware, and the art of manufacturing it died with him, all attempts to imitate it having failed. — Pebble ware. See pebbleware. — Persian ware. See Persian. — Plated ware. See plated. — Plumbeous ware, lead-glazed pottery. — Porphyry ware, a variety of pebbleware. The name is generally given to that variety which is speckled red and black. — Raphael ware, an old name for Italian majolica, taken from the occasional appearance of designs by Raphael, or ascribed to him, painted on majolica plates of a late period, or perhaps, in some cases, from the use of arabesques similar to those painted under Raphael's direction in the Loggia of the Vatican and elsewhere. — Red porphyry ware, a variety of pebbleware. The name is generally given to pieces which are speckled red and white. — Robbia ware. Same as Della Robbia ware. — Roman red ware. Same as Samian ware. — Rustic, Salopian, Samian, sanitary ware. See the adjectives. — Satsuma ware. (a) Pottery made in the province of Satsuma, in the island of Kiusiu, Japan. It has an extremely hard paste, is pale-yellow or brownish yellow in color, and is covered with a very minute crackle. (b) A pottery made at Stoke-upon-Trent in England, imitated in the main from the Japanese Satsuma. — Serpentine, Sevillian, sigillated, silicon ware. See the qualifying words. — Sinceny ware, an enameled pottery made in Sinceny, in the department of the Aisne, France, decorated with great taste and delicacy, in partial imitation of Rouen ware and later of Chinese ceramic painting, and also in various fantastic styles. — Small ware or wares, textile articles of the tape kind, as narrow bindings of cotton, linen, silk, or wooden fabric; plaited sash-cord, braid, etc.; also, buttons, hooks, eyes, and other dress-trimmings; hence, trifles.

Every one knows that street is a market for small ware in wit. Swift, To a Young Poet.

Stamped ware. Same as sigillated ware. — Stanniferous ware, earthenware coated with an enamel of which tin is a principal ingredient. This enamel is used for the wares, such as Delft. — Tinned, tortoise-shell, Umbrian ware. See the adjectives. — Tunbridge ware, a species of inlaid or mosaic work in wood. It derives its name from the place of manufacture, Tunbridge in England. — Verd antique ware, a variety of pebbleware, generally veined with dark green, gray, and black. — Wedgwood ware [named after Josiah Wedgwood (1730-95), the inventor, born in Staffordshire, England], a superior kind of semi-vitrified pottery, without much superficial glaze, and capable of taking on the most brilliant and delicate colors produced by fused metallic oxides and others. It is much used for ornamental ware, as vases, etc., and, owing to its hardness and property of resisting the action of all corrosive substances, for mortars in the laboratory. — Welsh ware, a pottery made at Islworth, near London in England, from about 1825; a strong and solid earthenware of yellowish-brown color with a transparent glaze. = Syn. Merchandise, etc. See properly.

ware² (wâr), v. t.; pret. and pp. warred, ppr. warring. [Also war; < ME. waren (also barren), sell; cf. *war*², n.] To use; employ; lay out; expend; spend. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

warefulness (wâr'fûl-nes), n. [< wareful + -ness.] Wariness; cautiousness. Sir P. Salway.

warega-fly (wa-râ'gâ-flî), n. [< S. Amer. Ind. waraga + E. fly.] An undetermined muscid fly occurring in Brazil, which is said to lay its eggs in the skin of man and animals, causing large swellings inhabited by the larva. E. Smith, Trans. Entom. Soc., London, 1868.

ware-goose (wâr'gôs), n. [*< ware*³ + goose.] The Brent-geese; so called from feeding on ware or seaweed. [Local, Eng.] warehouse (wâr'hôus), n. [*< ware*² + house.] A house in which wares or goods are kept; a storehouse.

The vassel'd kingdom of swift Aeolus, Great Ware-house of the Windes, whose traffic gives Motion of life to every thing that lives. Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 2.

Specifically:—(a) A store in which goods are placed for safe-keeping; a building for the temporary deposit of goods for a compensation. (b) A building for storing imported goods on which customs dues have not been paid. (c) A store for the sale of goods at wholesale; also, often, a large retail establishment. — Bonded, Italian, etc., warehouse. See the adjectives.

warehouse (wâr'hôus), v. t.; pret. and pp. warehoused, ppr. warehousing. [< warehouse, n.] To deposit or secure in a warehouse; specifically, to place in the government or custom-house stores, to be kept until duties are paid.

Only half the duty was to be paid at once, on ware-housing the pepper in a warehouse approved by the customs. S. Powell, Taxes in England, II. 76.

warehouseman (wâr'hôus-man), n.; pl. warehousemen (-men). 1. One who keeps a warehouse. — 2. One who is employed in or has charge of a warehouse. — Italian-warehouseman. See Italian. — Warehousemen's itch, a form of eczema of the hands, supposed to be caused by the irritation of sugar, grocers' itch.

warehousing (wâr'hôu-sîng), n. 1. The act of placing goods in a warehouse. — 2. The business of receiving goods for storage. — Warehousing system, a customs regulation by which imported articles may be lodged in public or bonded warehouses at a reasonable rent, without payment of the duties on importation until they are withdrawn for home consumption, thus lessening the pressure of the duties which otherwise would bear heavily on the merchant and cripple his purchasing power. If they are reexported no duty is charged. This system affords valuable facilities to trade, and is beneficial to the consumer and ultimately to the public revenue.

wareless (wâr'les), a. [*< ware*¹ + -less.] 1. Unwary; incautious; heedless.

A bait the wareless to beguile. Mor, for Mays, (Latham).

Delft Ware, 17th century. (From "L'Art pour Tous.")

domestic interiors. Pottery has been made in this place from ancient times, and dated pieces exist as old as the beginning of the sixteenth century; but the importation from China and Japan of Oriental porcelain stimulated the decorators of later times, so that the richest pieces are of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. (b) A name given in England to vessels of pottery for domestic use, especially for table service. It is common to discriminate pottery from porcelain by the name Delft or Delft, and also Delft-china, etc. — Della Robbia wares. (a) A name given to a class of pottery used for works of art in relief and in the round; generally asserted to have been invented by Luca della Robbia in the fifteenth century. It has a hard and well-baked body of brown terra-cotta, upon which a white stanniferous enamel is applied. This is in some cases left white, or white with a background of blue; in others, all parts of the composition are richly decorated with color, especially green, yellow, and purple or maroon. The largest and most elaborate works in Della Robbia ware were made after Luca's death, the most important of all being, perhaps, the frieze on the hospital at Fiesole. Central Italy abounds in the productions of this school of artists, including tabernacles or shrines decorated with sacred subjects, altar-pieces in bas-relief and alto-relief, architectural ornaments, and fountains or lavabos in sacristies of churches and convents. (b) A fine terra-cotta, enameled in colors, made in England for architectural decorations, flower-vases, garden-seats, etc., especially that made at Tamworth at works founded in 1817. — Double-glazed ware, stoneware to which a glaze is applied in liquid form, both inside and outside, before it is fired. Also called Bristol ware. — Egyptian black ware, Egyptian ware. See Egyptian. — Etruscan ware. See Etruscan. — Faenza ware, a name formerly given to Italian majolica. J. C. Robinson, in Cat. of Soulares Coll., 1856. Compare faience. — Glass-glazed ware. See glass-glazed. — Graffito ware. See graffito. — Green-jasper ware, a variety of Wedgwood ware. The name has been given to that kind of pebbleware which is mottled green and gray. — Hollow ware, vessels deeper than flat ware, and especially such as are made in outside molds, which give the external surface—the clay being forced into

5. A summons; a call; a bidding.

It [sheris] illumine the face, which as a beacon gives warning . . . to arm. Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 3. 147.

6. A notice given to terminate a business relation, as that of master and servant, employer and employee, landlord and tenant: a notice to quit.

Servants in husbandry [23 Hen. VI., c. 12] are required to give their masters warning, and to engage with some other master before quitting their present service.

Ribton-Turner, Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 66.

warning (wâr'ning), p. a. In biol., serving as a menace to enemies; of threatening aspect; somewhat specially used of a strikingly conspicuous coloration. See the quotation.

A never-failing interest attaches to the subject of Warning Colors. The history of the discovery of warning colors in caterpillars is quoted with many examples, showing that the education of enemies is assisted by the fact that warning colors and patterns often resemble each other, and there is abundant evidence to show that insect-eating animals learn by experience. Amer. Nat., Oct., 1890, p. 329.

warningly (wâr'ning-li), adv. In a warning manner; so as to warn; by way of notice or admonition.

warning-piece (wâr'ning-pēs), n. Something that warns. (a) A warning-gun; a signal-gun; the discharge of a cannon intended as a notification. Compare piece, 4 (b).

Hark! upon my life, the knight! 'tis your friend;
This was the warning-piece of his approach.

Beau. and Fl., Wit at Several Weapons, v. 2.

The treason of Watson and Cleark, two English seminaries, is sufficiently known; it was as a "prædium" or warning-piece to the great "fougade," the discharge of the powder-treasure. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 97.

(b) In horol., a part of the striking-mechanism of a clock that, by the movement of the lower wheel, throws the striking-system periodically into action. It is also operated by the strike-or-silent mechanism, so that the striking-mechanism may be thrown out of gear at will.
When in position to work, it causes a slight noise at the instant of starting the striking-parts, and thus gives warning that the clock is about to strike.

warning-wheel (wâr'ning-hwēl), n. In horol., a warning-piece in the form of a wheel.

warnisht, warniset, v. t. Middle English forms of garnish.

He wight hem of-sent,

Men's perceptions are warp'd by their passions.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 132.

8. Naut., to move into some desired place or position by hauling on a rope or warp which has been fastened to something fixed, as a buoy, anchor, or other ship at or near that place or position: as, to warp a ship into harbor or to her berth.

They warp'd out their ships by force of hand.
Mir. for Mags., p. 881.

Seeing them warp themselves to windward, we thought it not good to be boarded on both sides at an anchor.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, II. 41.

9. In agri., to fertilize, as poor or barren land, by means of artificial inundation from rivers which hold large quantities of earthy matter, or warp (see warp, n., 4), in suspension. The operation, which consists in inclosing a body or sheet of water till the sediment it holds in suspension has been deposited, can be carried out only on flat low-lying tracts which may be readily submerged. This system was first systematically practised in Great Britain on the banks of the Trent, Ouse, and other rivers which empty into the estuary of the Humber.

10. To change. [Rare.]

Freeze, freeze, thou bitter sky,
Thou dost not bite so high
As benefits forgot;
Though thou the waters warp,
Thy sting is not so sharp
As friend remember'd not.

Shak., As You Like it, ii. 7. 187.

II. intrans. 1. To turn, twist, or be twisted out of straightness or the proper shape.

After the manner of wood that curbeth and warpeth with the fire.

Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 561.

It's better to shoot in a bow that has been shot in before, and will never start, than to draw a fair new one, that for every arrow will be warping.

forth, with the help of Genoese boats.

Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 101.

warp (wârp), n. [< ME. warpe; < warpen, v.] 1t. A throw; a east.—2. Hence, a east of herrings, haddocks, or other fish; four, as a tale of counting fish. [Prov. Eng.]-3. A cast lamb, kid, calf, foal, or the like; the young of an animal when brought forth prematurely. [Prov. Eng.]-4. The sediment which subsides from turbid water; the alluvial deposit of muddy water artificially introduced into low lands in order to enrich or fertilize them. The term warp is sometimes applied to tidal alluvium. "The Humber warp is a marine and estuarine silt and clay, which occurs above the Peat beds." (Woodward.) As the word is used by J. Trimmer, it has nearly the same meaning as surface-soil. The word is rarely, if ever, used in the United States as meaning a sedimentary deposit.

5. A cast or twist; the twist or bending which occurs in wood in drying; the state of having a cast, or of being warped or twisted.

Somebody in Berkshire, I fancy, had warped his mind against you, and no mind is more capable of warps than his. S. Bowles, in Merriam, II. 337.

6. The threads which are extended lengthwise in a loom, and across which the woof is thrown in the process of weaving.

The ground of the future stuff was formed by a number of parallel strings called the warp, having their upper ends attached to a horizontal beam, and drawn taut by weights hung from their lower ends. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 206.

Weaving through all the poor details
And homespun warp of circumstance.

Whittier, Snow-Bound.

7. Naut., a rope, smaller than a cable, used in towing, or in moving a ship by attachment to something fixed; a towing-line.

We furled now for the last time together, and came down and took the warp ashore.

R. H. Dana, Jr., Before the Mast, p. 430.

A warp of weeks, four weeks; a month. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

To part a warp. Same as to part a line (which see, under line). Warp-dyeing machine, an apparatus for drawing warp-threads, laid out in sets, through a dye-bath. Each warp is separated from the next by a pin, and the set is passed through the dye between rollers, and delivered from between squeezing-cylinders, which press out the superfluous dye. E. H. Knight.

warpage (warp'pāj), n. [< warp + -age.] The act of warping; also, a charge per ton made on shipping in some harbors.

war-paint (warp'pānt), n. 1. Among some savage tribes, paint applied to the face and other parts of the person, according to a recognized and traditional system, as a sign that the wearer is about to engage in war. Its origin may have been an attempt to strike terror to the mind of the enemy.

The war-paint on the Saclien's face,
Unwet with tears, shone fierce and red.

Whittier, Bridal of Pennacook, iii.

2. Hence, full dress and adornment; official costume. [Slang.]

war-path (warp'pāth), n. Among the American Indians, the path or route followed by a warlike expedition; also, the military undertaking itself. To go on the war-path, to go to war.

"The warrior whose eye is open can see his enemy," said Magua. . . . "I have brought gifts to my brother. His nation would not go on the war-path, because they did not think it well."

J. F. Cooper, Last of Mohicans, xxviii.

warp-beam (warp'bēm), n. In a loom, the roller on which the warp-threads are wound, and from which they are drawn as the weaving proceeds. It is placed at the back, opposite the cloth-beam, which receives the finished fabric. E. H. Knight.

warp-dresser (warp'dres'ēr), n. In weaving, a machine for treating yarns with size before winding them on the yarn-beam of a loom. It is superseded in some mills by the larger machine called a slasher. E. H. Knight.

warper (warp'pēr), n. [< warp + -er.] 1†. A weaver.—2. One who winds yarn in preparation for weaving, to form the warp of a web.—3. A warping-machine.

warp-frame (warp'frām), n. In lace-manuf., a machine employing a thread for each needle, the threads being wound on a beam like the warp-beam of a loom (whence the name). Also called warp-net frame.

Hakluyt's Voyages, i. 144.

warrant-officer (wor'an-tis-er), n. An officer who acts under a warrant from a department of the government, and not from the sovereign or head of the state as in the case of commissioned officers. Gunners, boatswains, sail-makers, and carpenters in the navy, and master gunners and quartermaster-sergeants in the army, are examples of warrant-officers.

warrantor (wor'an-tor), n. [*OF. warrantor, warrantor, also garantior, garantior, garantior*, etc. (cf. guarantor). < warrant, warrant: see warrant, v.] One who warrants: correlative of warrantee: a form chiefly used in legal phraseology.

warranty (wor'an-ti), n.; pl. warranties (-tiz). [Formerly also warrantie; < OF. warrantie, later garantie (> E. guaranty, guarantee) (= Pr. garantia, garantia, garantia = Sp. garantia = Pg. garantia = It. garantia, ML. reflex warrantia). < warrant, warrant: see warrant. Cf. guaranty, guarantee.] 1. Authority; justificatory mandate or precept; warranty.

From your love I have a warranty

To unburden all my plots and purposes.

Shak., M. of V., i. 1. 132.

Nor farther notice, Arete, we crave

Than thine approval's sovereign warranty.

B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, v. 3.

There is no scientific warranty for saying that Matter is absolutely indestructible, and more than one consideration indicates that the structure of Matter may be such as to denote that in its present form it has had a beginning and may have an end.

A. Daniell, Prin. of Physics, Int., p. 7.

2. Security; assurance; guaranty; warrant.

The stamp was a warranty of the public. Locke.

3. In law, a statement, express or implied, of something which the party making it undertakes shall be part of the contract and in confirmation or assurance of a direct object of the contract, but which is yet only collateral to that object. More specifically — (a) In the law of real property: (1) Formerly, a covenant in a grant of freehold, binding the grantor and his heirs to supply other lands of equal value, should the grantee be evicted from those granted by any paramount title. (2) In modern practice, an assurance in a deed that the premises are conveyed in fee simple absolute except as otherwise specified, the effect being that, if the title fail, the grantee is exonerated from paying any purchase-money remaining unpaid, or may recover damages, the grantor's heirs and devisees being liable to the extent only that they may have received assets from the grantor. (b) In the law of insurance, a statement on the part of the insured or the applicant for insurance, forming a part of the contract, and on the actual truth of which, irrespective of its materiality, the validity of the policy depends. (c) In the law of sales, an assurance or engagement by the seller, express or implied, that he will be answerable for the truth of some supposed quality of the thing sold, as its soundness, or its fitness for the buyer's purpose, or its title. — Collateral warranty, in old Eng. law, a warranty which did not come from the same ancestor from whom the lands would have descended, but descended in a line collateral to that of the land; distinguished from lineal warranty, where the land and the warranty were descended from the same ancestor. — General warranty, a warranty against the acts and claims of all persons whomsoever, as distinguished from a warranty against claims of specified persons, called special warranty. — Implied warranty, a warranty not expressed in the contract, but resulting by operation of law from the making of the contract: as, where one sells a thing in his possession, there is an implied warranty on his part that he has ownership. — Lineal warranty. See collateral warranty. — To vouch to warranty. See vouch.

a "wash"; applied on the exchanges to a mere transfer by a broker of the stock or commodity which one principal had instructed him to sell to another customer who had given instructions to purchase a similar quantity of the same stock or commodity. [Stock-exchange slang.]

Washed or fictitious sales are positively forbidden, and will render the parties concerned liable to suspension or expulsion from the Produce Exchange.

New York Produce Exchange Report, 1888-9, p. 265.

3. In zooil., overlaid, as a surface or a ground-color, with a wash or light tint or color; as, a fox's black pelt washed with silver. See wash, n., 10 (d).—Washed brick. See brick.

washenl. An obsolete past participle of wash. Chaucer.

washer (wosh'er), n. [< wash + -er.] 1. One who or that which washes; as, a washer of clothes; a dish-washer; a wool-washer.—2. An annular piece of leather, rubber, metal, or other material placed at a joint in a water-pipe or faucet to make the joint tight and prevent leakage, or over a bolt, or a similar piece upon which a nut may be screwed. Washers serve as cushions or packing between many parts of machines, rails, vehicles, and iron structures. When used in buildings at the ends of tie-rods, they are often of large size and diverse shapes, and are called specifically wall-washers. Some forms are used as locks, to prevent a nut from shaking loose, as in a railroad fish-plate. Such washers are made in the shape of a spring, to allow a certain amount of vibration without disturbing the nut. See lock-nut, and cuts under bolt, packing, and plug-cock.

3. A similar article forming an ornament, as at the socket or pin that holds any adjustable utensil; as, the mother-of-pearl washers of a fan. Compare rosette.—4. wash-house (wosh'hous), n. [*ME. waschhous, < AS. wasc-haus, < wascan, wash, + hūs, house; as wash + house.] A house, generally fitted with boilers, tubs, etc., for washing clothes, etc.; a washing-house.

washiness (wosh'i-nēs), n. The state of being washy, watery, or worthless; want of strength.
washing (wosh'ing), n. [< ME. waschunge, waschunge, wessunge, waschunge, < AS. wæscung, washing, verbal n. of wascan, wash; see wash, v.] 1. The act of cleansing with water; ablution.

Ceremonial washing has been practised in ancient and modern times and among various peoples. The principal ceremonial washings in the modern Christian church are two: washing of feet in commemoration of the washing of the feet of the disciples by Christ (see foot); and washing of the hands, especially in connection with the celebration of the eucharist. In the Western Church, as well as in the Greek and other Oriental churches, the priest washes his hands before celebration. In the Western Church he also washes his fingers after the offertory and at the end of the eucharistic office. See ablution, lavabo, purification, and holy water (under water).

John wondered why the Messiah, the Lamb of God, pure and without spot, who needed not the abstersions of repentance, or the washings of baptism, should demand it.

Jer. Taylor Works (ed. 1835), I, 95.

2. Clothes washed, especially those washed at one time; a wash.—3. The result of washing; that which is washed from something else, as gold dust.—To give one's head for washing, to submit to insult.

So am I, and forty more good fellows, that will not give their heads for the wash; I take it.

Ben Jonson, Volpone, iv. 3.

washing-bear (wosh'ing-bär), n. The wash-bear or racoon, Procyon lotor; so called from its habit of putting its food into water before eating it, as if to wash it. See lotor, and cut under racoon.

washing-crystals (wosh'ing-kris talz), n. pl. See sodium carbonate, under sodium.

washing-drum (wosh'ing-drum), n. In mining, same as washing-trammel.

washing-engine (wosh'ing-en'jin), n. In paper-manuf., the first of the series of rag-cutting and -cleaning machines used to reduce rags to pulp. It cleans the rags and cuts them to the size known as half-stuff, which is passed on to the beating-engine. See rag-engine. E. H. Knight.

washing-house (wosh'ing-hous), n. A wash-house.

washing-machine (wosh'ing-mä-shēn'), n. An apparatus, operated by hand or steam-power, for washing clothing, fabrics, wool, or other material; a clothes-washer. Washing-machines for domestic and laundry use have been made in the form of churns, rubbing, or beating-machines, and tumbling-boxes. While a great variety of machines have been introduced, all depend essentially upon some mechanical device for stirring and beating the clothes in a vessel containing hot soapy water. Rubbing the clothes against a ribbed surface under water appears to be the most common method. For bleacheries and mills where large quantities of fabrics are to be washed, the material is made up into continuous bands, and is drawn through vats over rollers. In some machines beaters are used to assist in cleaning the fabrics. Such machines are of the nature of bucking-machines, keirs, winching-machines, and dash-wheels. Washing machines are designed to be used with wringers. One form for domestic use is practically a form of wringer, the clothes being cleaned by drawing them between rollers of corrugated rubber.

washing-powder (wosh'ing-pon dēr), n. A powdered preparation (as of soda-ash and Scotch soda) used in washing clothes.

washing-rollers (wosh'ing-ro lērz), n. pl. Rollers for squeezing goods or yarn after scouring. They are of cast-iron, turned true and smooth. The requisite pressure is applied by means of compound levers or movable weights. E. H. Knight.

washing-shield (wosh'ing-shēld), n. In washing, a ridged or corrugated shield for the palm of the hand, or a shield at once to protect the person and supply a surface on which to rub the clothes. E. H. Knight.

Washington canvasback. Same as redhead, 2.

Washington cedar. See cedar, 2, and cut under Sequoia.

Washingtonia (wosh-ing-tō'mi-ä), n. [NL. (Wendland, 1879), named after George Washington (1732-99), first President of the United States.] A genus of palms, of the tribe Corypheæ. It is characterized by bisexual flowers with slightly imbricated segments, and a three-lobed ovary with elongated filiform style. The albumen of the seed is uniform, like that of the related genera Corypha and Sabal, but the embryo, unlike the others, is sub-basilar. There is but one species clearly known, W. filifera, native of southern California and the adjacent border, called desert-palm, and locally fan-palm and San Diego palm. It produces a tall robust cylindrical trunk, enlarged at the base, often 40, sometimes 75, feet high, crowned by a cluster of light green circular pinnate leaves with from 40 to 60 folds about 4 feet across, cleft nearly to the middle into induplicate segments fringed with fine white pendu-ious threads often a foot long. The stout leafstalk ends in a large appressed blade, is about 3 feet long, and is set with strong, hooked spines along its edges. The mature tree bears in June three or four smooth elongated pinnate spadices with very many slender flexuous branchlets. The small dry flowers are white, sessile, and persistently without change, the corona salver-shaped with a fleshy tube and sharp lanceolate lobes, and the six projecting stamens have large filaments and anthers. A single spadix 3 feet long hangs pendent at ripening, in September or October, bearing about ten pounds of small black ellipsoidal one-celled fruits, each with a single shining brown lony seed surrounded by a thin sweetish pulpy pericarp. This is the only arborescent palm in the United States far from the sea; it occurs there chiefly in the desert in San Diego county, California; in Lower California it approaches the coast. It was discovered by Dr. C. C. Parry, 1849-50; it is now frequent in cultivation, especially along the California coast, often under the name of Pritchardia filamentosa or Brachia glifera; when very young, it is valued in America as a house-plant. Since 1875 it has been grown by thousands along the Mediterranean near Nice for outdoor decoration, where the characteristic appearance after twelve years' growth is that of a huge bulbous trunk, often 10 feet in girth and 10 feet high, bearing a crown of foliage 20 feet across, composed of from 50 to 80 white-fringed leaves. It varies greatly in habit with age. It has been known to blossom at twenty-two years; one fifty years old was 53 feet high and 11 feet in girth. At maturity, its older leaves turn down, and cover the trunk with a dry thatch, a protection from the desert heat and winds, but burning so readily that it forms a source of danger from fire. The W. robusta of cultivation, peculiar in its reddish petiole-bases, is now considered a variety of the foregoing; W. Sonora of Mexico, with deep crimson-brown petioles and stem, is said to be distinct.

Washingtonian (wash'ing-tō-ni-an), a. and n. [< Washington (see def.) + -ian]. 1. a. Pertaining to or relating to George Washington (1732-1799), first President of the United States, or to Washington, the capital of the United States, or to Washington, one of the United States, named after him.

II. n. An inhabitant of Washington, the capital of the United States, or of Washington, one of the United States.

washingtonite (wash'ing-ton-it), n. [< Washington (see def.) + -ite]. A variety of ilmenite found near Washington in Litchfield county, Connecticut.

Washington lily, thorn. See lily, 1, and thorn 1 (with cut).

washing-trommel (wash'ing-trom'el), n. A trommel used for washing ores. A washing-trommel consists usually of a cylinder of sheet-iron from 5 to 10 feet long, which turns on its axis, and through which a copious stream of water flows, the stuff as it passes out being caught on one or more perforated sheet-iron screens, by which the clayey particles are separated from the ore, and this latter sometimes roughly sorted. The form and arrangement of washing-trommels vary considerably according to the character of the ore and of the impurities with which it is mixed. See trommel. Also washing-drum.

washing-up (wash'ing-up'), n. In mining, same as clean-up, 2. Also washing-off (Australia).

washing-vessel (wash'ing-ves'el), n. [< ME. waschunge vessel; < washing + vessel]. A vessel to wash in. Prompt, Parv., p. 517.

wash-leather (wash'leth'ēr), n. A fine white or light-yellow, very soft, and flexible leather, originally made from the skins of Rupicapra tragus, the Alpine chamois. Leather very closely resembling it in all its properties is now made from skins of sheep, goats, deer, calves, and from split hides, the coarser qualities being known as wash-leather. The skins are lined to remove the hair, steeped in a weak solution of lactic or acetic acid to neutralize the lime, and then frizzed or rubbed with pumice-stone or a blunt knife to remove the grain. Repeated tanning by pounding or rolling in oil, washing with weak alkaline solution to remove the oil, stretching, drying, and smoothing complete the process of manufacture.

The greengrocer put on a pair of wash-leather gloves to hand the plates with. Dickens, Pickwick, xxxvii.

washman (wash'man), n.; pl. washmen (-men). 1. A washerman.—2. A beggarman covered with simulated sores. [Old cant.]

There [the front] lies at the watch for any fly or minnow that comes near to him.

I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 75.

Nor could she otherwise account for the judge's quiescent mood than by supposing him craftily on the watch, while Clifford developed these symptoms of a distracted mind.

Huethorne, Seven Gables, xvi.

5. A person, or number of persons, whose duty it is to watch over the persons, property, or interests of others; a watchman, or body of watchmen; a sentinel; a sentry; guard.

Such, they say, as stand in narrow lanes,

And beat our watch, and rob our passengers.

Shak., Rich. II., v. 3. 8.

Home in a coach, round by the Wall, where we met so many stops by the Watchers that it cost us much time and some trouble, and more money, to every Watch, to them to drink.

Pepys, Diary, III. 410.

6. The period of time during which one person or body of persons watch or stand sentinel, or the time from one relief of sentinels to another; hence, a division of the night, when the precautionary setting of a watch is most generally necessary; period of time; hour. The Jews, like the Greeks and Romans, divided the night into military watches instead of hours, each watch representing the period for which each separate body of sentinels remained on duty. The proper Jewish reckoning recognized only three such watches: the first (lasting from sunset till about 10 P. M.), the second or middle watch (10 P. M. to 2 A. M.), and the third, or morning watch (from 2 A. M. till sunrise). After the establishment of the Roman power they were increased to four, which were named as first, second, etc., or by the terms even, midnight, cock-crowing, and morning, these terminating respectively at 9 P. M., midnight, 3 A. M., and 6 A. M.

7. Naut.: (a) The period of time occupied by each part of a ship's crew alternately while on duty. The period of time called a watch is four hours, the reckoning beginning at noon or midnight. Between 4 and 8 P. M. the time is divided into two short watches, or dog-watches, in order to prevent the constant recurrence of duty to the same portion of the crew during the same hours. Thus, the period from 12 to 1 P. M. is called the afternoon watch, from 1 to 6 the first dog-watch, from 6 to 8 the second dog-watch, from 8 to 12 the first night watch, from midnight to 1 A. M. the middle watch, from 1 to 8 the morning watch, and from 8 to 12 noon the forenoon watch. When this alternation of watches is kept up during the 24 hours, it is termed having watch and watch, in distinction from keeping all hands at work during one or more watches.

After 2, or 3, watches more we were in 24 fadoms.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I, 112.

(b) A certain part of the officers and crew of a vessel who together attend to working her for an allotted time. The crew of every vessel while at sea is generally divided into two parts: the starboard watch, which in the merchant service is the captain's watch, and is often commanded by the second mate; and the port or larboard watch, which in the merchant service is commanded by the chief mate. In the British and United States navies these watches are commanded by the lieutenants successively. The anchor-watch is a small watch composed of one or two men appointed to look after the ship while at anchor or in port.

8. Anything by which the progress of time is perceived and measured. (a) A candle marked out into sections, each of which required a certain time to burn.

Fill me a bowl of wine. Give me a watch.

Shak., Rich. III., v. 3. 63.

(b) A small portable timepiece or timekeeper that may be worn on the person, operated by power stored in a coiled spring, and capable of keeping time when held in any position. Watches were invented at Nuremberg about the beginning of the sixteenth century, and for a long time the wearing of a watch was considered in some degree a mark or proof of gentility. Thus Malvolio remarks in anticipation of his great fortune:

I frown the while; and perchance wind up my watch, or play with my—some rich jewel. Shak., T. N., ii. 5. 65.

The new contrivance of applying precious stones to watches I had the good fortune to see when Mr. Facio, the inventor, and an ingenious man, and Mr. Debauffe, the workman, presented their watches, to have the approbation of the Royal Society.

W. Derham (Ellis's Lit. Letters, p. 173).

A friend of mine had a watch given him when he was a boy, a "bull's eye," with a loose silver case that came off like an oyster-shell from its contents; you know them—the cases that you hang on your thumb, while the core, or the real watch, lies in your hand as naked as a peeled apple.

O. W. Holmes, Professor, ii.

9. pl. A name of the trumpetleaf, Sarracenia flura, probably alluding to the resemblance of the flowers to watches.—10. In pottery, a trialpiece of clay so placed in a kiln that it can be readily withdrawn to enable the workmen to judge by its appearance of the heat of the fire and the condition of the ware remaining in the saggars.—11. In hawking, a company or flight, as of nightingales.—Beat of a watch. See beat¹.—Duplex watch, a watch having two sets of teeth upon the rim of its escapement-wheel.—Officer of the watch. See watch-officer.—Paddy's watch. Same as paddy's watch.—Parish watch. See parish.—The Black Watch, a semi-military organization in Edinburgh, Scotland, in the early part of the eighteenth century. From this a regiment of the British army was afterward formed, and the name was ultimately given to the 42d and 73d regiments, which are now the 1st and 2d Battalions of the Black Watch or Royal Highlanders.—To muster the watch. See muster.—To stand a watch. See stand.

Watch and ward, the old custom of watching by night and by day in towns and cities. English writers up to the seventeenth century recognize a distinction between watch and ward, the former being used to signify a watching and guarding by night, and the latter a watching, guarding, and protecting by day. Hence, when the terms were used in combination, especially in the phrase to keep watch and ward, they implied a continuous and uninterrupted watching and guarding, constant vigilance and protection by night and by day.

It ys the Strongest towne of walls, towers, Bulwerks, watches and wardes that ever I saw in all my lyf.

Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 16.

I sawe at the towne of Braxima all the artillerie brought together to y^e gates of your house; I saw watch and ward kept round about your lodging.

Guevara, Letters (tr. by Helwiese, 1577), p. 246.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii, The Magnificence.

watch-box (woch'bocks), n. A sentry-box.

watch-candle (woch'kan dl), n. Same as watching-candle.

Were it not better for a man in a fair room to set up one great light, or branching candlestick of lights, than to go about with a small watch candle into every corner?

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i. 45.

watchcase (woch'käs), n. 1. The outer case for a watch. Formerly it was often a hinged cover or box fitted closely over the watch proper, and having openings through which the dial appeared and the stem or ring projected. In modern watches this feature is generally absent, and the watchcase is the metal cover, usually of gold or silver, which incloses the works.

We now never see watch-cases made of other materials than the precious metals, or imitations thereof; but then [reign of Queen Anne] beautiful cases were made of shagreen of various colours, or tortoiseshell inlaid or studded with gold.

J. Ashton, Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, l. 159.

2. Same as watch-pocket.—3. A sentry-box. [Rare.]

O thou dull god [sleep], why liest thou with the vile

In loathsome beds, and leavest the kingly couch

A watch-case, or a common alarm-bell?

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iii. 1. 17.

watchcase-cutter (woch'käs-kut'ér), n. A machine for cutting hinge-recesses in watchcases. E. H. Knight.

watch-clock (woch'klok), n. 1. An alarm.

Powerful Need (Arts ancient Dame and Keeper,

The early watch-clock of the slothful sleeper).

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii, The Handy-Crafts.

2. A timepiece used as a time-detector or time-reporter for a watchman. It is made in many forms. One kind is a small portable clock that must be carried by the watchman to different stations on his rounds. At each station a special key fastened to a chain must be used to make a mark on a paper dial inside the clock, thus making a record of the performance of his duty. Another form consists of a fixed clock, having a key that must be touched to make the record, the clock being placed at each station. Another and now more common form is a clock placed at a central station, and connected by wires with the place where the watchman makes his rounds; at each station the watchman touches a push-button to close the circuit and print a mark on a dial in the clock.

watch-dog (woch'dog), n. A dog kept to watch or guard premises and property.

'Tis sweet to hear the watch-dog's honest bark Bay deep-mouth'd welcome as we draw near home, Byron, Don Juan, i. 123.

watcher (woch'ér), n. One who or that which watches. Specifically—(a) One who sits up and continues awake; one who lies awake.

Gie on your nightgown, lest occasion call us,
And show us to be watchers.
Shak., Macbeth, ii. 2. 71.

(b) One who keeps awake for the purpose of guarding or attending upon something or some one; a nurse, watchman, sentry, or the like.

On the frontiers . . . were set watchmen and watchers in dyuers manners.
Berners, tr. of Froissart's Chron., II. xlix.

A charr'd and wrinkled piece of womanhood
Sat watching like a watcher by the dead.
Tennyson, Princess, v.

(c) One who observes; as, a watcher of the time.

Then felt I like some watcher of the skies,
When a new planet swims into his ken.
Keats, Sonnets, xi.

(d) A spy; one sent to watch an enemy. Jer. iv. 16.
watchet (woch'et), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also watched; < ME. watchet, wagett, wageth, varhet; prob. from an OE. form ult. connected with wound.] A light- or pale-blue color.

Celestro, azure, watchet, or skie-colour. Celeste, heauenlie, celestiall. Also skie-colour or azure and watchet.
Florio.

Yclad he was ful smal and properly
Al in a kirtel of a lyght waget.

Chaucer, Miller's Tale, i. 135.

[There are MS. variations waget, wagett, and waechet, of which the last only is in print.]

Their watchet mantles fringed with silver rownd.
Spenser, F. Q., III. iv. 49.

The greater shippes were towed downe with boates and oares, and the mariners, being all apparelled in watchet or skie coloured clothe, rowed a maine, and made way with diligence.

Hakluyt's Voyages, quoted in R. Eden (First Books on America), ed. Arber, p. xxxviii.

His habit is antique, the stuffe Watchet and silver.

Dekker, London's Tempe.

watch-fire (woch'fir), n. A fire maintained during the night as a signal, or for the use of a watching party, guard, sentinels, etc.

watchful (woch'ful), a. [< watch + -ful.] 1. Watchful; sleepless.

What watchful cares do interpose themselves
Betwixt your eyes and night? Shak., J. C., ii. 1. 98.

2. Vigilant; careful; wary; cautious; observant; alert; on the watch; with of before the thing to be regulated or observed, and against before the thing to be avoided; as, to be watchful of one's behavior; to be watchful against the growth of vicious habits.

Be watchful, and strengthen the things which remain.
Rev. iii. 2.

Watchful Servants to the Bagnio come,
They're ne'er admitted to the bathing room.

Conyngere, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

=Syn. 2. Watchful, Vigilant, Wakeful, attentive, heedful, circumspect, guarded. Watchful refers to the lack of disposition to sleep, especially at times when one would ordinarily have such a disposition; watchful and vigilant refer to the mind, will, or conduct; they are of about equal vigor; watchful is the broader in its range of meaning.

watchfully (woch'fûl), adv. In a watchful manner; vigilantly; heedfully; with careful observation of the approach of evil, or with attention to duty.

watchfulness (woch'fûl-nês), n. The state or character of being watchful, in any sense.

watch-glass (woch'glâs), n. 1. A sand-glass used to measure the time of a watch, as on shipboard; usually a half-hour glass. — 2. A thin concavo-convex piece of glass used for covering the dial of a watch. Those made in recent times for watches that have not a double case, or hunting-case, are thicker, and have a peculiar flattened curve. Compare crystal, 2 (c).

watch-guard (woch'gård), n. A chain, ribbon, or cord fastened to a watch, and either passed around the neck or secured to some part of the clothing.

watch-gun (woch'gun), n. A gun fired at the changing of the watch, as in a fortress or garrison, or on board a man-of-war.

watch-header (woch'hed ér), n. The officer in charge of a watch.

The divisions of the crew are known as the starboard and larboard watches, commanded respectively by the first and second mates or the second and third mates, who are known as watch-headers.

Fisheries of the U. S., V. ii. 229.

watch-house (woch'hous), n. 1. A house in which a watch or guard is placed. — 2. A house where night-watchmen assemble previous to the hour at which they enter upon their respective beats, and where disturbers of the peace seized by them during the night are lodged and kept in custody till morning, when they are brought before a magistrate; a lockup.

At the Golden Ball and 2 Green Posts (There being a Hatch with Iron spikes at the door), near the Watch-House in Lambeth Marsh.

Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, II. 118.

watching (woch'ing), n. [Verbal n. of watch, v.] A keeping awake; a vigil.

In watchings often. 2 Cor. xi. 27.

Watchings of flowers. Same as rigils of flowers (which see, under rigil).

watching-candle (woch'ing-kan'dl), n. The candle used at the watching or waking of a corpse.

Why should I twine my arms to caddes, sit up all night like a watching-candle, and distil my brains through my eyelids?
Academy of Compliments (1714).

watch-jewel (woch'jô'e), n. A jewel, usually a ruby, in which is drilled a hole for an arbor, used in the works of a watch, to lessen friction and wear.

watch-key (woch'kê), n. A small key with a square tube to fit the winding-arbor of a watch, serving to wind the watch by coiling the main-spring.

watch-light (woch'lit), n. A light kept burning at night, as for the use of a watcher in the sick-room.

There's a star;

Morello's gone, the watch-lights show the wall.

Browning, Andrea del Sarto.

watchmaker (woch'mâ'kêr), n. One whose occupation is to make and repair watches. — Watchmakers' cramp, a neurosis affecting watchmakers, in which, through irregular muscular action, it becomes impossible to hold in the eye-socket the lens with which they examine their work. Occasionally also the fingers are affected in a manner similar to what is observed in writers' cramp. — Watchmakers' drill. See drill.

watchmaking (woch'mâ'king), n. The art or operation of making watches; the business or occupation of a watchmaker.

watchman (woch'man), n.; pl. watchmen (-men). [< ME. watcheman; < watch + man.] A person set to keep watch; specifically, a sentinel; a guard; one who guards the streets of a city by night; also, one set to keep guard, as over a building in the night, to protect it from fire or thieves.

They went, and made the sepulchre sure with watchmen, and sealed the stone.

Tyndale (1526), Mat. xxvii. 66.

Watchman, what of the night? Isa. xxi. 11.

Our watchmen from the towers, with longing eyes, Expect his swift arrival. Dryden, Spanish Friar, i. 1.

Who has not heard the Scowrer's Midnight Fane?
Who has not trembled at the Mochock's Name?

Was there a Watchman took his hourly Rounds Safe from their blows or new invented Wounds?

Gay, Trivia, iii. 327.

Watchman's clock. See clock.

watch-mark (woch'mârk), n. A mark worn on the right or the left arm of a man in the naval service according as he is stationed in the starboard or the port watch.

watch-meeting (woch'mê'ting), n. A religious meeting or religious services held on the last night of the year, and terminated on the arrival of the new year. See watch-night.

watchment (woch'ment), n. [< watch + -ment.] A watching; vigil; observation. [Rare.]

My watchments are now over, by my master's direction.
Richardson, Pamela, I. 171.

watch-night (woch'nit), n. The last night of the year, on which, in some churches, religious services are held till the advent of the new year.

watch-officer (woch'of'is-êr), n. The officer in charge of the deck of a ship, who takes his turn with others in standing watches, during which time, subject to the authority of the commanding officer, he has charge of the ship. Also called officer of the watch.

watch-oil (woch'oil), n. A refined, very limpid and fluid lubricating-oil, used in oiling clocks and watches. Olive- or almond-oil after clarifying is much used for this purpose. Also clock-oil.

watch-paper (woch'pâ'pêr), n. A small circle of paper, silk, muslin, or other material, inserted in the outer case of an old-fashioned watch, to prevent the metal from defacing the inner case. These papers were frequently cut with elaborate designs, or painted with miniatures or ciphers and devices. Those of textile fabrics were embroidered in silk, or with human hair. Commoner ones were printed with the head of some public character, or with some motto or sentiment.

watch-peel (woch'pêl), n. A watch-tower.

Watch-peels, castles, and towers looked out upon us as we walked.
Geikie, Geol. Sketches, i.

watch-pocket (woch'pok'et), n. A small pocket in a garment for carrying a watch on the person; also, a pocket, bag, etc., in or on the head-curtain of a bed for holding the watch at night.

watch-pole (woch'pôl), n. The pole or truncheon carried by a watchman.

I know a gentleman that has several wounds in the head by watch-poles, and has been thrice run through the body to carry on a good jest. Steele, Spectator, No. 358.

watch-rate (woch'rât), n. A rate authorized to be levied in England for watching and lighting a parish or borough.

watchspring (woch'spring), n. The mainspring of a watch.

watch-stand (woch'stand), n. A contrivance for holding the watch when it is not worn on the person, enabling the dial to be seen. The form is often that of a small clock-case, and the stands of the eighteenth century were frequently very rich, both in material and in workmanship.

watch-tackle (woch'tak'), n. Naut., a small tackle consisting of a double and single block with a fall. Also called handy-billy.

By hauling every brace and bowline, and clapping watch-tackles upon all the sheets and halyards, we managed to hold our own. R. H. Dana, Jr., before the Mast, p. 250.

watch-telescope (woch'tel'e-skôp), n. See telescope.

watch-tower (woch'tou'êr), n. A tower on which a sentinel is placed to watch for enemies, for the approach of danger, etc.

I stand continually upon the watch-tower in the day-time. Isa. xxi. 8.

About a mile from the towne there is a very high and strong watch tower. Corgat, Crudities, I. 10.

watchword (woch'wêrd), n. [< ME. wacche-word; < watch + word.] 1. A word or short phrase to be communicated on challenge to the watch or sentinels in a camp; a password or signal by which friends can be known from enemies.

Wacche wordes to wale, that weghis might know.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 6056.

Hence—2. Any preconceived indication or a direction eagerly watched for, as a signal for action.

All have they cares upright, wayting when the watch-word shall come that they should all rise generally into rebellion. Spenser, State of Ireland.

3. A word used as a motto, as expressive of a principle or rule of action; a maxim, byword, or rallying-ery.

"Now" is the constant syllable ticking from the clock of time. "Now" is the watchword of the wise. "Now" is on the banner of the prudent. Parr.

His watchword is honour, his pay is renown.
Scott, Rokeby, v. 20.

4. The call of a watchman or sentry as he goes his rounds.

Since when a watchword every minute of the night goeth about the wals to testifie their vigilancy.

Sandys, Travails, p. 10.

To set a watchword upon, to make proverbial; turn into a byword.

S. Paule himselfe (who yet for the credite of Poets) alledgeth twice two Poets, . . . setteth a watch-word vpon Philosophy, indeede vpon the abuse. So dooth Plato, vpon the abuse, not vpon Poetrie. Plato found fault that the Poet of his time filled the worlde with wrong opinions of the Gods.
Sir P. Sidney, Apol. for Poetrie.

watchwork (woch'wêrk), n. The machinery of a watch: now usually in the plural.

water, v. t. A form of wat. See wit.

water (wâ'têr), n. [< ME. water, watër, water, watër, < AS. water = OS. watar = OFries. weter, watër = D. water = MLG. water = OHG. wazzar, MHG. wazzar, G. wasser, water; with a formative -r, akin to fecl, ratn = Sw. ratten = Dan. rand = Goth. ratô (pl. ratnô), in which a different formative -n appears; cf. OBulg. Russ. voda, Lith. vandù, Gr. idôp (idat, idôp), Skt. udan, water; < Teut. \sqrt{wat} , Indo-Eur. \sqrt{wad} , be wet. Cf. wash, Thout from the same root as water. See wet.]

1. A transparent, inodorous, tasteless fluid, H_2O . Water is a powerful refractor of light and an imperfect conductor of heat and electricity; it is very slightly compressible, its absolute diminution for a pressure of one atmosphere being only about one twenty-thousandth of its bulk. Although it is colorless in small quantities, it is blue like the atmosphere when viewed in mass. It assumes a solid form, that of ice or snow, at 32° F. (0° C.), and it takes the form of vapor or steam at 212° F. (100° C.), under a pressure of 29.9 inches (more exactly, 760 millimeters) of mercury, retaining that form at all higher temperatures. Under ordinary conditions, therefore, water possesses the liquid form only at temperatures lying between 32° F. and 212° F. The specific gravity of water is 1 at 39.2° F. (4° C.), being the unit to which the specific gravities of all solids and liquids are referred: one cubic foot of water at 62° F. weighs about 1,000 ounces or 62.5 pounds. Water is 770 times heavier than atmospheric air at 32° F. (0° C.) and under a pressure of 760 millimeters. It has its greatest density at 39.2° F. (4° C.), and in this respect it presents a singular exception to the general law of expansion by heat. It water at 39.2° F. is cooled, it expands as it cools till reduced to 32°, when it solidifies; and if water at 39.2° F. is heated, it expands as the temperature increases in accordance with the general law. Considered from a chemical point of view, water is a compound substance, consisting of hydrogen and oxygen, in the proportion of 2 volumes of the former gas to 1 volume of the latter; or by weight it is composed of 2 parts of hydrogen united with 16 parts of oxygen. It exhibits in itself neither acid nor basic properties. Water enters, as a liquid, into a peculiar kind of combination with the greater number of all known substances. Of all liquids water is the most powerful and general solvent, and on this important property its use depends. Without water the processes of animal and vegetable life would come to a stand. The globe is covered on about $\frac{3}{4}$ of its surface by the ocean water, to an average depth of very nearly 12,500 feet. (See ocean.) This water is, however, far from pure, since it holds in solution nearly $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. of its weight of saline matter, about three-fourths of which is common salt. The ocean water is not potable, but pure water can be obtained from it by distillation, as is often done at sea—for which purpose, however, fuel and a somewhat cumbersome apparatus are required. Some towns on the South American coast have been supplied with water exclusively in this way, up to the time when works were completed for bringing it from the distant mountains. The chief source of supply for the water which falls upon the earth is the ocean, from whose surface it is raised by the heat of the sun in the form of vapor, ready to be condensed again and fall as rain or snow either on sea or land, in accordance with varying and complicated conditions of climate and topography. The precipitation of rain and snow upon different parts of the earth's surface varies greatly, both in its total amount and in its seasonal distribution. Some regions receive as much as 600 inches in a year; over other extensive areas the rainfall is so small that it is hardly possible to measure it. In some districts the rain is pretty equally distributed through the year; in others it is all, or nearly all, limited to one season, as winter or summer. These climatic conditions are matters of the utmost importance, as regards both the distribution and the welfare of the human race and of animal and vegetable life in general. The habitability and fertility of the earth depend in part on temperature and in part on the amount and character of the precipitation. In general, where there is no rainfall the region is either very sparsely or not at all inhabited, and vegetation is almost entirely wanting; of this character is a considerable part of northern Africa and central Asia; such regions are called deserts. Other regions, where there is some rainfall, but where the amount is small, are destitute of forests but support a more or less abundant growth of grasses. Such regions are, as a rule, thinly inhabited, and the population is pastoral and nomadic; of this character are large areas in central Asia, and in both North and South America. Regions of abundant or even of moderately large precipitation are generally forested, and can be successfully cultivated after the forests have been cut down; these, in general, are the densely inhabited parts of the world. Such are the essential facts and conditions of the distribution of population as connected with rainfall. But to these are many exceptions. Thus, the Nile flows for 2,000 miles through a rainless region, but has a somewhat dense population for a considerable distance along its banks, though only there, the river itself being the sole source of water-supply for the inhabitants of the valley. Some regions of very small rainfall are situated sufficiently near high mountain-ranges on which the precipitation is comparatively large, and from which water can be obtained in considerable quantity with a moderate expenditure of money. In this connection the fact that the precipitation at high altitudes is chiefly in the form of snow is a matter of great importance, as thereby the supply of water is made capable of lasting through, or nearly through, the summer, the snow melting gradually, while the precipitation in the form of rain would be carried away much more rapidly. Rain, if caught at a distance from human habitations and after it has been falling for some time, contains hardly a perceptible trace of foreign matter. Snow falling in the polar regions is also very nearly chemically pure. By distillation, with suitable precautions, water may be obtained which will leave no trace of residue when evaporated in a platinum vessel, and which will also be free from gaseous contents. The water of springs and rivers always contains more or less mineral matter, which it has dissolved out from the soil and rock with which it has been in contact upon the surface or underground. Next to rain-water, the purest natural water is that of mountain-lakes fed from melting snow, and resting on crystalline and impermeable rocks; and rivers in uninhabited regions, running over similar rocks, are also very nearly pure, sometimes leaving not more than two or three grains to the gallon of foreign matter when evaporated to dryness. Rivers, on the other hand, which run over calcareous and soft shaly and clayey rocks always contain a considerable amount of impurities; from fifteen to twenty grains to the gallon is not an uncommon amount under such conditions. Pure water, such as that of mountain-lakes and rivers running over crystalline rocks, is called soft; water containing more than eight or ten grains to the gallon of mineral matter is called hard.

The foreign matter in soft water is partly organic and partly mineral; in the latter a little silica is always present, as well as salts of potash, soda, lime, and magnesia. The impurities of hard water are varied in character, but carbonate of lime generally predominates. The mineral impurities of water are not necessarily deleterious to health, even if present in somewhat large quantities. The contamination of water by organic matter (such as sewage, and the like) is a matter of great importance and often of great danger. Dead organic matter is rapidly oxidized by exposure to the air in flowing water, and ceases to be dangerous to health. The living organisms with which water is sometimes contaminated, in receiving the sewage of towns or in other ways, are sometimes the germs of deadly disease, and appear to possess a large amount of vitality, so that they can be conveyed for long distances without becoming disorganized, as is the case with dead organic matter. See water-supply.

Yit signes moo men see Ther water is, as the fertillite
 Of withi, reede, aller, yvy, or syne,
 That ther is water nygh is verrey signe.
Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 171.
 As cold waters to a thirsty soul, so is good news from a far country.
Prov. xxv. 25.

Specifically—(a) Rain.
 By sudden floods and fall of waters
 Buckingham's army is dispersed and scatter'd.
Shak., Rich. III., iv. 4. 512.

(b) Mineral water. See mineral.
 Mineral Waters, . . . as the Sulphurous Waters at the Bath.
Gideon Harvey, Vanities of Philosophy and (Physick (ed. 1702), xvi.
 Then houses drunly Gyman water,
 To mak' himsel' look fair and fatter.
Burns, The Two Dogs.

(c) pl. Waves, as of the sea; surges; a flood.
 Therefore will not we fear, . . . though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea; though the waters thereof roar and be troubled.
Is. xlv. 3.
 Our Souls have sight of that immortal sea, . . .
 And see the Children sport upon the shore,
 And hear the mighty waters rolling evermore.
Wordsworth, Ode, Immortality.

2. A limited body of water, as an ocean, a sea, or a lake; often, in provincial English and Scotch use, a river or lake; as, Derwent Water (lake); Gala Water (stream). In law the right or title to a body of water is regarded as an incident to the right to the land which it covers, and the term land includes a body of water thereon.

And many yers he for the passion of Crist, the lay over the same water a tree, for a foote bryge, wheroff the holy Crosse was after wardis made.
Torkington, Diary of Eng. Travell, p. 27.
 Having travelled in this Valley near four hours, we came to a large Water called the Lake.
Maunderell, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 3.

The mosses, waters, slaps, and stiles
 That lie between us and our home.
Burns, Tam o' Shanter.

3. Any aqueous or liquid secretion, exudation, humor, etc., of an animal body. (a) Tears.

For these things I weep; mine eye, mine eye runneth down with water, because the comforter that should relieve my soul is far from me.
Lam. i. 16.
 The water stood in his eyes.
Buayan, Pilgrim's Progress, ii.

(b) Sweat; perspiration.
 The word water may stand for sudor; a horse is all on a water (in Palsgrave); . . . we should say, lather.
Oliphant, New English, I. 455.

(c) Saliva; spittle.
 For the thought of Peter's oysters brought the water to his mouth.
W. S. Gilbert, Etiquette.

(d) Urine.
 Well, I have cast thy water, and I see
 Th' art fall'n to wit's extremest poverty, Sure in consumption of the spitefully part.
Mareton, Satires, iv. 125.

(e) The aqueous or vitreous humor of the eye; eye-water.
 (f) The serous effusion of dropsy, in a blister, and the like; as, water on the brain. (g) pl. In obstet., the liquor amnii.

4. A distilled liquor, essence, extract, or the like. See strong water, under *strong*¹.

But this water
 Hath a strange virtue in't, beyond his art;
 It is a sacred relic, part of that Most powerful juice with which Medea made Old Æson young.
Massinger, Bashful Lover, v. 1.
 His wife afterwards did take me into my closet, and give me a cellar of waters of her own distilling.
Pepys, Diary, April 1, 1668.

5. In phur., a solution of a volatile oil, or of a volatile substance like ammonia or camphor, in water.—6. Transparency, as of water; the property of a precious stone in which its beauty chiefly consists, involving also its refracting power. In this sense the word is applied especially to diamonds, and is used loosely to express their relative excellence; as, a diamond of the first water; hence used figuratively to note the degree of excellence or fineness of any object of esteem; as, genius of the purest water. See the phrase first water, below.

An excellent lapidary set these stones, sure;
 Do you mark their waters?
Fletcher, Rule a Wife, v. 2.

7. The waterside; the shore of a sea, lake, stream, or the like, considered with or apart from its inhabitants; specifically, a watering-place; a seaside resort. [Provincial.]

Gar warn the water, braid and wide.
Jamie Telfer (Child's Ballads, VI. 110).

The water, in the mountainous districts of Scotland, is often used to express the banks of the river, which are the only inhabitable parts of the country. To raise the water, therefore, was to alarm those who lived along its side.
 Quoted in Child's Ballads, VI. 110, note.

The phrase "going to the waters" has been familiar to me for the last forty years as used by the peasantry in the counties of Huntingdon, Rutland, and Lincoln. By it is meant a seaside place, and not an inland watering-place, such as Malvern, Bath, Leamington, or Cheltenham.
N. and Q., 7th s. r., VII. 378.

8. In finance, additional shares created by watering stock. See water, v. t., 4.

By the much-abused word "property" he referred, of course, to the fictitious capital, or "water," which the gas companies had added to their real capital.
N. A. Rev., CXLIII. 92.

Above water, adverb; hence, figuratively, out of embarrassment or trouble.

Being asked by some that were not ignorant in Sea Affairs how long he thought the Ship might be kept above Water, he said he could promise nothing, but that it could not be done above three Hours.
N. Bailey, tr. of Colloquies of Erasmus, I. 277.

Aerated waters. See aerate.—Aix-la-Chapelle water, a mineral water obtained from various thermal springs at Aix-la-Chapelle in Rhénish Prussia, containing a large proportion of common salt, also other sodium salts and sulphur.—Aix-les-Bains water, from thermal springs of the same name in Savoy, contains chiefly sulphates and carbonates of sodium, magnesium, and calcium in small proportion, employed in the form of systematic bathing in the treatment of gout, rheumatism, skin-diseases, etc.—Alien water. See alien.—Apollinaris water, an agreeable sparkling water from Rhénish Prussia, containing a very minute proportion of mineral ingredients, used as a table-water. Bag of waters, in obstet., the bulging fetal membranes, filled with liquor amni, which act as a hydraulic wedge to dilate the mouth of the womb.—Ballston Spa waters, from Ballston, New York, effervescent waters, containing a large amount of common salt with carbonates of calcium and magnesium. They possess tonic and cathartic properties.—Baryta-water. See baryta.—Basic water. See basic.—Benediction of the waters, in the Gr. Ch., the solemn public ceremony of blessing the water in the phiale, the running waters, and the sea, observed annually with a procession and other rites on the feast of the Epiphany. See holy water, below.—Bethesda water, from Waukesha, Wisconsin, an effervescent water, containing but a small proportion of mineral ingredients; used chiefly in the treatment of urinary disorders and as a table-water.—Between wind and water. See wind.—Bitter water, a purgative mineral water having a bitter taste owing to the presence of a large amount of sulphate of magnesium, or Epsom salts. Friedrichshall water is an example of a bitter water.—Black water. Same as pyrosis.—Blue Lick water, a strong sulphur water, containing also a large amount of salt, obtained from the Blue Lick Springs, Kentucky. It possesses cathartic properties, and is used largely in the treatment of catarrhal troubles of the respiratory, digestive, and urinary tracts.—Broken water. See broken.—Buffalo lithia water, an alkaline sulphur water, containing some lithia, from Mecklenburg county, Virginia. It is diuretic and slightly laxative, and is employed in the treatment of lithemia, Bright's disease, and certain forms of dyspepsia.—Burning water, alcohol. Compare fire-water.

Take the beste wyyn that ge may fynde. . . . But firste ge muste distille this wyyn 7. tymes, and then have ge good brunynge water.
Book of Quinte Essence (ed. Furnival), p. 4.

Canterbury water, water tinged with the blood of Thomas Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury, who was murdered in 1170, and afterward canonized as a saint and martyr. See the quotation.

To satisfy these cravings, so as to hinder an uneasy feeling at the thought of fasting human blood, a tiny drop was mingled with a chalice-full of water, and in this manner given to those who begged a sip. This was the famous "Canterbury-water." Never had such a thing as drinking a martyr's blood been done before; never has it been done since. Rock, Church of our Fathers, III. i. 124.

Carbonated water, water charged with carbonic-acid gas; either natural spring-water like seltzer and apollinaris, or distilled water artificially charged with the gas.—Carlsbad water, an alkaline sulphated water, heavily charged with carbonic acid, from various thermal springs in Carlsbad, Bohemia; employed extensively in the treatment of gout, rheumatism, urinary disorders, chronic diseases of the eye and ear, intestinal catarrh, and chronic constipation.—Chow-chow water. See chow-chow.—Clysmic water, an agreeable sparkling table-water, containing chiefly calcium bicarbonate, from Waukesha, Wisconsin. It is used also as a diuretic in bladder troubles.—Cologne water. Same as cologne.—Crab Orchard water, a cathartic water, containing a rather large proportion of magnesium sulphate and a smaller amount of some other sulphates and carbonates, obtained from springs of the same name in Kentucky.—Deep water or waters, water too deep for comfort or safety; hence, figuratively, embarrassment, trial, or distress.

Let me be delivered from them that hate me, and out of the deep waters.
Ps. lxxv. 14.

Once he had been very nearly in deep water because Mrs. Froudie had taken it in dudon that a certain young rector, who had been left a widower, had a very pretty governess for his children.
Trollope,

False waters, in obstet., a fluid which occasionally collects between the amnion and the chorion.—First water, the highest degree of fineness in a diamond or other precious stone; hence, figuratively, the highest rank morally, socially, or otherwise. The expression first water, when applied to a diamond, denotes that it is free from all traces of color, blemish, flaw, or other imperfection, and that its brilliancy is perfect. Often used attributively.

One comfort, folk are beginning to take an interest in us — I see mobs of the first water looking with a fatherly eye into our affairs. (C. Reade, Dixon.)

Franz-Josef water, a bitter water, containing a small proportion of iron, obtained at Fured, Hungary. It is used as a cathartic, and also in the treatment of chronic rheumatism and catarrhal conditions of the respiratory and alimentary tracts. — Friedrichshall water, a "bitter water" from the village of this name in Germany. It is strongly aperient, containing a large proportion of sulphates and chlorides of magnesium and sodium. It is used as a cathartic and also in diseases of the heart and kidneys and in chronic bronchitis. — Frightened water. See frighten. — Giesshubler water, an acreable sparkling alkaline water from Giesshubler-Fuchstein, near Carlsbad in Bohemia; used as a table-water, and also in cases of uric acid diathesis and of dyspeptic and other troubles referred thereto. — Goulard water, an aqueous solution containing about 25 per cent. of lead subacetate; the liquor plumbi subacetatis of the United States Pharmacopoeia, used as a lotion in inflammation. — Ground water, surface moisture, or the water retained by the porous surface-soil. Ground water flows in accordance with the common law of hydrostatics, but its motion is impeded by friction. Compare ground air, under air. — Hard water. See def. 1. — Harrowgate waters, chalybeate and sulphur waters from the watering-place of this name in Yorkshire, England. They are aperient, and are used chiefly in the treatment of skin-diseases and of morbid conditions of the intestinal canal. — High water, the greatest elevation of the water at flood-tide; also, the time when such highest point in the flow is reached.

Gaffer was away in his boat; . . . he was not, according to his usual habits at night, to be counted on before next high water. (Dickens, Our Mutual Friend, l. 13.)

High-water mark, the mark or limit of water at high tide; hence, figuratively, the highest limit attained or attainable; as, the high-water mark of prosperity. Sometimes erroneously written high water-mark.

His [Wordsworth's] "Ode on Immortality" is the high-water mark which the intellect has reached in this age. (Emerson, English Traits.)

High-water shrub, a shrubby composite plant, Itea frutescens, a native of the United States along the sea-coast from Massachusetts to Texas. Also called marsh-elder. — Holy water, water used for ritual purification of persons and things; especially, water blessed by a Christian priest, and used to sprinkle upon persons or things, or to sign one's self with at entering church. Holy or hustral water has been used in almost all religions in purification of persons and things, especially in preparation for worship, and also to drive away the powers of evil. Under the ancient Jewish law, the priests bathed their hands and feet in a laver before entering the tabernacle or approaching the altar (Ex. xxx. 17-21, xl. 30-32), and the "water of purification" (Num. xix. 7, xix. 9, etc.) presents another analogy to Christian usage. The use of holy water in the Christian church is very ancient. In the Roman Catholic Church holy water is prepared every Sunday by exorcism and benediction of salt, and exorcism and benediction of the water, after which the salt is cast in the water, and both again blessed together. In the Greek Church the use of a holy-water stoup (columbin) at the entrance of a church is almost obsolete. Holy water is used in the houses, and is blessed on the first of the month in the phiale, and at the Epiphany there is a general blessing of water. See cut under stoup, 3. — Holy-water clerk, sprinkler, stick. See holy. — Homburg water, a chalybeate saline water from springs in Homburg near the Rhine; used in the treatment of dyspepsia and disorders of the liver, especially those that have been brought on by high living. — Hot Springs waters, calcic sulphur waters from a number of thermal springs in Hot Springs, Arkansas. They are largely employed in the treatment of syphilis, rheumatism, and chronic diseases of the skin and mucous membranes. — House of water. See house. — Hungary water, a preparation of spirits of rosemary, used especially during the eighteenth century, as a lotion, a perfume, or an internal remedy. The name is said to have been given to it in allusion to a queen of Hungary who tested the efficacy of the water in bathing.

All these ingredients mention'd are to be had at the Apothecaries, except the Queen of Hungaries Water, which is sold by Mich. Johnson, Bookseller in Leitchfield. (The Happier Sinner (1691), quoted in N. and Q., 7th ser., [X. 115].)

Hunyadi János water, a cathartic water, containing a large percentage of sodium and magnesium sulphates, obtained from Budapest in Hungary. — Interdiction of fire and water. See interdiction. — Jack in the water. See jack. — Javelle's water. See eau de Javelle, under eau. — Kissingen water, a mildly laxative water obtained from several springs in the town of this name in Bavaria. It is used in affections of the liver and alimentary canal, chronic bronchitis, and other catarrhal conditions. — La Bourboule water, mineral water from La Bourboule, in Puy-de-Dôme, France. It is used in the treatment of various skin diseases and in chronic malarial troubles. — Lebanon Springs water, a mineral water, containing chiefly carbonate and sulphates, obtained from Lebanon Springs, New York. It is used principally in the treatment of diseases of the digestive and urinary tracts. — Like water, with the ready or abundant flow of water; hence, overflowing; abundantly; freely, as, to spend money like water.

They came round about me daily like water; they compassed me about together. (Ps. lxxviii. 17.)

Lock of water. See lock. — Low water, low tide.

Set not her Tongue

A going agent;

She's made more Noise than half a dozen Paper-mills; London-Bridge at a low Water is Silence to her.

Low-water alarm. See alarm. — Low-water indicator. See indicator. — Low-water mark, the mark or limit of water at low tide; in a figurative sense, the lowest or a very low point or degree. Sometimes erroneously written low water-mark.

I'm at low water-mark myself — only one bob and a magpie; but, as far as it goes, I'll fork out and stump. (Dickens, Oliver Twist.)

Low-water slack, the time of slack water at the lowest stage of the tide, when the ebb has done and the flood has not yet made. — Marienbad water, a mineral water from the spa of this name in Bohemia, not far from Carlsbad. The water is used largely in gout, hemorrhoids, obesity, and liver troubles occurring as a result of high living, and also for chronic bronchitis, neuralgia, and cystitis. — Meteoritic waters, mineral waters, north water. See the adjectives. — Oil on troubled waters, figuratively, anything done or used to mollify, assuage, or allay; from the smoothing effect of the pouring of oil upon breaking waves, a common resource of modern seamen. The efficacy of oil for such use was known to the ancient Greeks and Romans (see "Notes and Queries," 6th ser., III. 252), and the literal practice no doubt preceded the figurative saying. — Orange-flower water. Same as orange-water. — Oxygenated water. See oxygenate. — Persicott-water. See persicott. — Pilot's water. See pilot. — Poland Spring water, a water, very weak in mineral constituents, obtained from South Poland, Mahne. It is employed chiefly as a table-water and as a diuretic in the treatment of chronic disorders of the urinary tract. — Potash-water. See potash. — Public, quick, quicksilver water. See the qualifying words. — Red water, bloody urine; hematuria. — Richfield Springs water, a sulphur water from the village of the same name in New York State, used largely in the treatment of rheumatism, skin-diseases, and chronic catarrhal affections of the respiratory tract. — Rockbridge Alum Springs water, a tonic water, with astringent taste, obtained in the place of the same name in Virginia. It is employed in the treatment of skin-diseases and catarrhal disorders of the digestive and urinary tracts. — Rosemary water. Same as Hungary water. — Rubinat-Condal water, an aperient water, containing chiefly sodium sulphate, obtained from a spring in the Spanish Pyrenees. — Saratoga waters, various mineral waters, some possessing tonic and others cathartic properties, obtained from Saratoga Springs, New York. They are used in the treatment of certain chronic skin-diseases, constipation, indigestion, and liver disorders, and in catarrhal conditions of the urinary and digestive tracts. Among the best-known of the springs are the Congress, Hathorn, High Rock, Geyser, Pavilion, Seltzer, and Vichy. — Sedative water. See sedative. — Selters water, a highly prized medicinal mineral water found at Nieder-Selters, a village in the province of Hesse-Nassau in Prussia. It contains a considerable quantity of sodium chloride (common salt), and much smaller quantities of sodium, calcium, and magnesium carbonates. Also called Seltzer water. — Sharon Springs water, a sulphur water from Sharon Springs, New York. It is largely used in the treatment of diseases of the skin, chronic catarrhal conditions of the respiratory and digestive tract, gout, and rheumatism. — Silicious, slack, strong water. See the adjectives. — Soden water, saline chalybeate water from Soden in Hesse-Nassau, Prussia. It is used chiefly in the treatment of chronic catarrhal affections of the respiratory tract and in the early stages of pulmonary consumption. — Soft water. See def. 1. — Sweet water. (a) Fresh as opposed to salt water. See sweet, a. s. (b) Glycerin. (c) Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 310. — Thermal waters, hot springs. — To bein hot water. See hot. — To break water. (a) To appear upon the surface of the water to blow, as a whale making its rising. (b) To float to the surface, as any sunken object. — To cast oil on troubled waters. See oil on troubled waters, above. — To cast (a person's) water. See cast. — To cast water into the Thames, to perform unnecessary or useless labor (possibly involving a play on the word Thames, suggesting temse, a sieve).

It is to give him (quoth I) as much almes or neede As east water in Tens, or as good a deede As it is to helpe a dogge over a stile. (J. Heywood, Proverbs (ed. Sharman), p. 60.)

To hold water. See hold. — To make foul water. See foul. — To make water. See make. — To pour water on the hands. See hand. — To take water. (a) To allow one's boat to fall into the wake of another boat, as in a race. Hence — (b) To weaken in a contest; bark out or back down. [Slang.] — To throw cold water on. See cold. — To tread water. See tread. — Troubled waters, a commotion; trouble; discord. See oil on troubled waters, above. — Under water, below the surface of the water. — Vals water, sparkling alkaline water from Vals in southern France. It is used in dyspepsia, urinary disorders, affections of the liver, obesity, gout, and diseases of the skin. — Vichy water. (a) An alkaline water, containing minute quantities of iron and arsenic, obtained from numerous thermal springs in Vichy, France, and also artificially prepared. It is used in the treatment of chronic catarrhal affections of the intestinal and urinary tracts, gall-stones, lithemia, gout, and rheumatism. (b) A water of somewhat similar composition from the Vichy Spring in Saratoga. See Saratoga waters. — Water bewitched, water slightly flavored, as with liquor; any weak or greatly diluted decoction; figuratively, an insipid, tasteless compound.

Indeed, madam, your ladyship is very sparing of your tea; I protest, the last I took was no more than water bewitched. (Swift, Polite Conversation, l.)

Water-check valve, in a steam engine, an automatic valve which regulates the water-supply delivered by the feed-water pipe to the boiler. See check-valve. — Water cider. See cider. — Water damaged. Same as water bewitched. — Hullivell. — Water in one's shoest, a source of discomfort or irritation to one.

They caressed his lordship very much as a new comer, whom they were glad of the honour to meet, and talked about a time to dine with him; all which (as they say) was water in his shoes. (Roger North, Lord Guilford, l. 235. (Davies.)

Water-of-Ayr stone. See Ayr stone, under stone. — Water of Cotunnus, a fluid filling the space between the ossicles and the membranous labyrinth of the ear; the perilymph, technically called liquor Cotunnii. — Water of crystallization. See crystallization. — Water of jealousy (literally, "water of bitterness"), in the ancient Jewish law, water to be drunk as directed in Num. v. 11-31 by a woman suspected by her husband of unfaithfulness, the act of drinking it serving as a test of innocence or guilt. — Water of life. (a) A liquid giving life or immortality to the drinker; specifically, in Biblical use, spiritual refreshment, strength, or salvation.

I will give unto him that is athirst of the fountain of the water of life freely. (Rev. xxi. 6.)

(b) Whisky, brandy, or other alcoholic liquor; a translation of the Irish and Gaelic name of whisky, and of the French name of brandy (cognac-de-vie). Compare agua vitae.

The shepherds . . . were collected together (not without a quench of the mountain-dew, or water of life) in a large shed.

(J. Wilson, Lights and Shadows of Scottish Life, p. 305.)

Water of purification. See holy water. — Water of separation (literally, "water of uncleanness"), in the ancient Jewish law, water mixed with the ashes of a red heifer burned with cedar-wood, hyssop, and scarlet, used to sprinkle upon unclean persons (Num. xix.). — Water on the brain. See brain. — Water-steam thermometer. See thermometer. — Water venom-globulin, a poisonous principle extracted from serpent-venom. — White Sulphur Springs water, a strong sulphur water from the springs of the same name in Greenbrier county, West Virginia. It is used in the treatment of chronic catarrhal disorders of the digestive and urinary systems, constipation, and various skin-diseases. — White water. (a) Shoal water near the shore; breakers. (b) The foaming water in rapids or swiftly flowing shallows.

The continuous white water of the upper rapids raging round the curve of a steep red bank.

(Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 631.)

(c) Foam churned up by a whale. — Wiesbaden water, a saline water obtained from numerous thermal springs in Wiesbaden, Hesse-Nassau, Prussia. It is used in the treatment of skin-diseases, gout, rheumatism, and neuralgia. — Wildungen water, a mineral water, containing carbonates of calcium and magnesium and a small percentage of sulphates, from Nieder-Wildungen in Waldeck. It is employed chiefly in the treatment of diseases of the urinary tract. — Yellow Sulphur Springs water, a mineral water from springs of the same name in Virginia. It contains a large proportion of lime salts and sulphates, and is cathartic. (See also barley-water, fire-water, lead-water, rice-water.)

water (wá'tér), v. [ME. wateren, wateren, wahren, wattron, waltrenn, wettrien, < AS. wætrian, water = D. wateren, water, make water, = MIIG. wezzern, G. wässern, irrigate, water (cf. IceL. vatna = Sw. vatna = Dan. runde, water); from the noun.] I. trans. 1. To put water into or upon; moisten, dilute, sprinkle, or soak with water; specifically, to irrigate.

All the grounds throughout the land of Egypt is continually watered by the water which uppon ye 25 day of August is turned into the countries round about.

Set fruit-trees round, nor e'er indulge thy sloth, But water them, and urge their shady growth.

(Addison, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, iv.)

2. To supply with water for drinking; feed with water; said of animals.

Aft times hae I water'd my steed

Wi' the water o' Wearie's well.

(The Water o' Wearie's Well (Child's Ballads, l. 199).)

If the inhabitants of a parish have a customary right of watering their cattle at a certain pool, the custom is not destroyed though they do not use it for ten years.

(Blackstone, Com. l., Int., iii.)

3. To produce by moistening and pressure upon (silk, or other fabric) a sort of pattern on which there is a changeable play of light. See watered silk, under watered.

These things [silk and cotton goods] are watered, which very much adds to their beauty; they are made also at Aleppo, but not in so great perfection.

(Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 125.)

4. To increase (the nominal capital of a corporation) by the issue of new shares without a corresponding increase of actual capital. Justification for such a transaction is usually sought by claiming that the property and franchises have increased in value, so that an increase of stock is necessary in order fairly to represent existing capital. [Commercial slang.]

The stock of some of the railways has been watered to an alarming extent by the issue of fictitious capital, existing only on paper, though ranking equally for dividend — when money for this is forthcoming. Usually, the paper stock has been sold to unwary purchasers.

(Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 857.)

To water one's plants, to shed tears. [Old slang.]

Neither water than thy plants, in that thou departest from thy pigges nose, neither stand in a manning whether it bee best to depart or not.

(Euphues to Philautus, M. 4. (Nares.)

II. intrans. 1. To give out, emit, discharge, or secrete water.

If they suffer the dusts of bribes to be thrown into their sight, their eyes will water and twinkle, and fall at last to blind connivance. (Rev. T. Adams, Works, l. 147.)

His eyes would have watered with a true feeling over the sale of a widow's furniture.

George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, i. 12.

2. To gather saliva as a symptom of appetite; said of the mouth or teeth, and in figurative use noting vehement desire or craving.

In their minds they conceived a hope of a dainty banquet. And, espying their enemies a farr of, began to swallow their spite as their mouths watered for greediness of their prey.

Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books on America, ed. [Arber, p. 181].

Oh, my little green gooseberry, my teeth waters at ye!
Farquhar, Love and a Bottle, v. 1.

The dog's mouth waters only at the sight of food, but the gourmand's mouth will also water at the thought of it.
J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 57.

3. To get or take in water; as, the ship put into port to water; specifically, to drink water.

We watered at the Canaries, we traded with the Salvages at Dominica. Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, i. 150.

Were I a poet, by Hippocrene I swear (which was a certain well where all the Muses watered), etc.
Dekker and Webster, Westward Ho, ii. 1.

A Mischance befel the Horse, which lamed him as he went a watering to the Seine. Howell, Letters, i. i. 17.

water-adder (wá'tér-ad'ér), n. An aquatic serpent like, or mistaken for, an adder. (a) The water-moccasin, a venomous snake. See moccasin 2 (with cut). [U. S.] (b) The commonest water-snake of the United States, Tropidonotus (often Nerodia) sipedon. This is a large, stout serpent, roughened with keeled scales, and somewhat spotted or blotched, like an adder, especially when young. It bites quite hard in self-defense when attacked, but is not poisonous. [U. S.] waterage (wá'tér-áj), n. [< water + -age.] Money paid for transportation by water.

water-agrimony (wá'tér-ag'ri-mō-ni), n. An old name of the bur-marigold, Bidens tripartita or B. cernua.

water-aloe (wá'tér-al'ō), n. Same as water-soldier.

water-analysis (wá'tér-ā-nal'i-sis), n. In chem., the analysis of waters, either to determine their potable quality, or fitness for use in boilers or otherwise in the arts.

water-anchor (wá'tér-ang'kōr), n. A sail distended by spars and thrown overboard to hold a vessel's head to the wind and retard her drifting; a drag-anchor. Also called sea-anchor.

water-antelope (wá'tér-an'tē-lōp), n. One of numerous different African antelopes, as of the genera Eleotragus, Kobus, and some others, which frequent marshy or reedy places; a reed-buck; a water-buck. See cuts under nayor and simu-sim.

water-arum (wá'tér-ā'rūm), n. See Calla, 1.

water-ash (wá'tér-ash), n. 1. A small tree, Fraxinus platycarpa, without special value, found in deep river-swamps from Virginia to Texas and in the West Indies.—2. The black hoop- or ground-ash, Fraxinus sambucifolia, of wet grounds in the eastern half of North America. Its tough pliable dark-brown wood is largely used for interior finish and cabinet-work, for making hoops and baskets, etc.

water-avens (wá'tér-av'enz), n. A plant, Geum rivale, found in wet meadows northward in both hemispheres. It grows some 2 feet high, and is noticeable for its nodding flowers (large for the genus), with purplish-orange petals, and, in fruit, for its feathery styles and persistent purple calyx. Also purple avens.

water-back (wá'tér-bak), n. 1. An iron chamber or reservoir or a combination of pipes, at the back of a cooking-range or other fireplace, to utilize the heat of the fire in providing a supply of hot water.—2. In brewing, a cistern which holds the water used for mashing.

water-bag (wá'tér-bag), n. 1. The reticulum of the stomach of the camel and other Camelidae, corresponding to the honeycomb tripe of ordinary ruminants.—2. In her., a bearing representing a vessel for holding water, usually drawn as if a leather bucket. It differs from water-houget, or houget, in retaining the form of the actual vessel.

water-bailage (wá'tér-bā'lāj), n. Bailage upon goods transported by water. See bailage.

Water-bailage, a tax demanded upon all goods by the City, imported and exported.

Pepys, Diary, Jan. 20, 1668-9. (Davies.)

water-bailiff (wá'tér-bā'lif), n. 1. A custom-house officer in a port town whose duty is to search ships.

Out of patience with the whole tribe of custom-house extortioners, boatmen, tide-waiters, and water-bailiffs, that beset me on all sides, worse than a swarm of musquitoes, I proceeded a little too roughly to brush them away with my rattan. Cumberland, West Indian, i. 5.

2. A former officer of the London corporation who saw to the observance of the statutes and by-laws applicable to the river Thames.—3. See water-bailiff, under bailiff.

water-balance (wá'tér-bal'ans), n. An old form of water-raising apparatus, consisting of a series of troughs one above another, supported in a hanging frame, and oscillating like a pendulum. As the frame swings, the water dipped by the lowest trough runs into that next above, and in the return motion it is emptied in turn from that into the next above again, and so on. E. H. Knight.

water-bar (wá'tér-bār), n. A ridge crossing a hill or mountain road, and leading aside water flowing down the road.

They . . . were descending, with careful reining in and bearing back, the steep, long plunges—for these mountain roads are like cataract beds, and travellers are like the falling water—where the only break and safety were the water-bars, humping up across the way at frequent intervals. Mrs. Whitney, Old or Even? xiii.

water-barometer (wá'tér-ba-rom'e-tēr), n. A barometer in which water is substituted for mercury. See barometer.

If a long pipe, closed at one end only, were emptied of air, filled with water, the open end kept in water, and the pipe held upright, the water would rise in it nearly twenty-eight feet. In this way water barometers have been made. Fitz Roy, Weather Book, p. 12.

water-barrel (wá'tér-bar'el), n. 1. A water-cask.—2. In mining, a large wrought-iron barrel with a self-acting valve in the bottom, used in drawing water where there are no pumps. [South Staffordshire, Eng.]

water-barrow (wá'tér-bar'ō), n. A two-wheeled barrow carrying a tank, often swung on trunnions, used by gardeners and others; a water-barrel. E. H. Knight.

water-basil (wá'tér-baz'il), n. In gem-cutting, a uniform bevel cut around the top of a stone, after the grinding of the upper flat table.

water-bath (wá'tér-báth), n. 1. A bath composed of water, in contradistinction to a vapor-bath.—2. In chem., a vessel containing water which is heated to a certain temperature, over which chemical preparations or solutions are placed in suitable vessels to be digested, evaporated, or dried at the given temperature.—3. Same as bain-marie.

Water-baths of various forms (A, B, C), with adjustable rings. a, b, c, to receive vessels of different sizes. B and C are arranged to have a constant water-supply.

water-battery (wá'tér-bat'ēr-i), n. 1. In elect. See battery.—2. In fort., a battery nearly on a level with the water.

water-beadle (wá'tér-bē'dl), n. A water-bailiff (?).

In the year 1700 one S. Smith, who is described as water-beadle, of St. Mary Magdalen, Bermondsey, left a legacy to his nephew, Matthew Smith, of this parish. N. and Q., 7th ser., VIII. 457.

water-bean (wá'tér-bēn), n. A plant of the genus Nelumbo.

water-bear (wá'tér-bār), n. A bear-animalcule. See Macrobiotidae, Arctidea, and Tardigrada.

water-bearer (wá'tér-bār'ēr), n. [< ME. watyr beare = Sw. vattenbärare = Dan. vandbærer; < water + bearer.] 1. One who carries water; specifically, one whose business is the conveying of water from a spring, well, river, etc., to purchasers or consumers.

Yf there be neuer a wyse man, make a water-bearer, a tinker, a cobbler, . . . controller of the mynte. Latimer, Sermon on the Plough.

2. [sup.] In astron., a sign of the zodiac. See Aquarius.

water-bearing (wá'tér-bār'ing), n. A journal-box having in the lower part a groove communicating with a pipe through which water under heavy pressure is admitted beneath the journal, which it raises slightly from its bearings. As the journal revolves, the water flows in an exceedingly thin film or sheet between it and the bearings, forming a very efficient lubricant. See cut in next column. Also called patier-glissant and hydraulic pilot.

water-bed (wá'tér-bed), n. A large india-rubber mattress filled with water, on which a very sick person, or one who is bedridden, is sometimes placed, to avoid the production of bed-sores. Also called hydrastatic bed.

water-beech (wá'tér-bēch), n. 1. A small tree, the American hornbeam, Carpinus Caroliniana; so named from its growing in wet ground, and a, wheel; b, shaft; c, d, bearings for the shaft; e, f, hinged supports for bearings; g, h, pipe and trenches through which water is forced into the hollow supports; i, slot through which the water passes into the bearings with sufficient force to support completely the weight of a and the shaft.

from its resemblance, especially in its bark, to the beech. Also called blue-beech.—2. Improperly, the sycamore, or American plane-tree, Platanus occidentalis, growing on low grounds, and having reddish wood like that of the beech.

water-beetle (wá'tér-bē'tl), n. A beetle which lives in the water. Such beetles belong mainly to the families Amphizoidae, Haliplidae, Dytiscidae, and Gyrinidae of the adephagous series, and the Hydrophilidae of the eluviorn series. The first four are sometimes grouped under the name Hydrophaga, as distinguished from the Gadeophaga, or ground-beetles and tiger-beetles. A few other beetles are to some extent aquatic; but the term is restricted to the species of the five families named. See these family names, and cuts under Dytiscus, Gyrinidae, Hydrobius, Hydrophilidae, and Hylidius. Compare water-bug.

water-bellows (wá'tér-bel'ōz), n. A form of blower used in gas-machines, and formerly to supply a blast for furnaces. It consists essentially of an inverted vessel suspended in water, on raising which in the water air is drawn in through an inlet valve, while on lowering the vessel the air is forced out again through another valve. Such vessels are usually placed in pairs, and are lowered and raised alternately. The device is also used for supplying air to the pipes of a pneumatic clock-system. The central clock lifts the inverted tank, and, letting it fall once a minute, sends a puff of air through the pipes, and thus moves all the hands of the clocks connected with the system.

water-bells (wá'tér-bel'z), n. The European white water-lily, Custalia speciosa (Nymphaea alba). Britten and Holland. [North. Eng.]

water-bird (wá'tér-bērd), n. In ornith., an aquatic as distinguished from a terrestrial or aerial bird; in the plural, the gallatorial and natatorial or vading and swimming birds, collectively distinguished from land-birds. The term reflects an obsolete classification in which birds were divided into three main groups, called aves arceae, aves terrestres, and aves aquatiles. These divisions are abolished, but the English names of two of them, land-bird and water-bird, continue in current use because of their convenience. Compare water-fowl, 2.

water-biscuit (wá'tér-bis'kit), n. A biscuit or cracker made of flour and water.

water-blackbird (wá'tér-blak'bērd), n. The water-ouzel, Cinclus aquaticus. See Cinclus and dipper, 5. [Ireland and Scotland.]

water-blast (wá'tér-blást), n. In mining, a method of ventilation, in which an apparatus is employed which is the same in principle as the trompe of the Catalan forge. See trompe 2.

It [the water-blast] is not much employed nowadays, and gives only a low useful effect.

Callon, Lectures on Mining (trans.), II. 441.

water-blebs (wá'tér-blebz), n. Pemphigus.

water-blink (wá'tér-blingk), n. A spot of cloud hanging in arctic regions over open water, the presence of which it serves to indicate.

The water-blink consists of dark clouds or spots on the horizon, and is formed by the ascending mists which gather in clouds and hang over pools of water. It is always the herald of advance, and is eagerly looked for. Schley and Soley, Rescue of Greely, p. 160.

water-blinks (wá'tér-blingks), n. Same as water-blink.

water-blob (wá'tér-blob), n. A local name of the marsh-marigold, Calltha palustris, of the white water-lily, Custalia speciosa (Nymphaea alba), and of the yellow water-lily, Nymphaea (Nuphar) lutea. Britten and Holland. [Prov. Eng.]

water-blue (wá'tér-blō), n. A coal-tar color used in dyeing, and similar to soluble blue. It is principally used for dyeing cotton.

water-board (wá'tér-bōrd), n. A board set up on the edge of a boat to keep off spray, etc.

water-boat (wá'tér-bōt), n. A boat carrying water in bulk for the supply of ships.

water-boatman (wá'tér-bōt-mān), n. 1. The boat-fly or boat-insect, an aquatic bug of the family Notonectidae: so called because these insects move in the water like a boat propelled by oars. They are more fully called back-swimmers, and also back-swimmers, because they row themselves about on their backs with their long feathered oar-like legs. Some species are very common in ponds and brooks in the United States, and are often put in aquariums to exhibit their silvery colors and curious actions. N. undulata is a characteristic example.

2. An aquatic bug of the family Corixidae. All the North American species belong to the genus Corixa, as C. undulata.

water-borne (wá'tér-bór-né), n. Borne or conveyed by water; carried in a boat or vessel; floated.

Thus merchandise might be waterborne from the channel to the Mediterranean.

Molten, Hist. Netherlands, IV. 147.

The stone of which it [bridge from the Strand to the opposite shore of the Thames] was constructed, being water-borne, had to pay this tax.

S. Dorell, Taxes in England, IV. 394.

Water-borne goods, goods carried on shipboard.

water-bottle (wá'tér-bót'l), n. A bottle made of glass, skin, rubber, or other material, and designed for holding water.

water-bouget (wá'tér-bó'jet), n. In her., same as bouget, 2.

water-bound (wá'tér-bóund), n. Impeded, hindered, or hemmed in by water, as in case of a flood, heavy rains, etc.

While water-bound, it [a foraging party] was attacked by guerrillas.

New York Tribune, April 30, 1862.

water-box (wá'tér-boks), n. A bottom or side of a furnace consisting of a compartment of iron kept filled with water. It serves to prevent the burning out of the iron.

water-brain (wá'tér-brān), n. Gid or staggers of sheep, caused by the brain-worm.

water-brain fever. Meningitis; acute hydrocephalus.

water-brash (wá'tér-brash), n. Same as pyrosis.

water-braxy (wá'tér-brak'si), n. A disease of sheep in which there is hemorrhage into the peritoneal cavity. See braxy.

water-break (wá'tér-brāk), n. A wavelet or ripple. [Rare.]

Many a silvery water-break

Tennyson, The Brook.

water-breather (wá'tér-brá'thēr), n. Any branchiate which breathes water by means of gills.

water-bridge (wá'tér-brij), n. A fire-bridge which also forms part of the water-space of a boiler. If dependent from the boiler, it is called a hanging bridge; if it has free-space above and below, it is a midfeather. Also called water-table.

water-brose (wá'tér-brōz), n. Brose made of meal and water only. [Scotch.]

I'll sit down o'er my scanty meal,
Be't water-bruse or muslin-kail,
Wi' cheerful face. Burns, To James Smith

water-buck (wá'tér-buk), n. A water-antelope, especially a kob, as Kobus ellipsiprymnus, which abounds in some African lowlands, as in Nyassa-land. Another water-buck is Cervicapra roborata. See kob, and cuts under singing and napping.

Among the mammals is the dangerous buffalo (Bubalus capra). The next to be is the recently admitted giraffe, . . . the guan, the pallah, the water-buck (Cobus).

Portability Rev., N. S., XLII. 472.

water-buckler (wá'tér-buk'ler), n. Same as water-shuck.

water-budget (wá'tér-buj'et), n. In her., same as bouget, 2. Also called dossier.

water-buffalo (wá'tér-buf'glo), n. See water-cow.

water-bug (wá'tér-bug), n. 1. Any true bug of the heteropterous section Hydrocoris or Cryptocercata, including those which live beneath the surface of the water, and belong to the families Corixidae, Notonectidae, Nepidae, Belostomatidae, and Naucoridae. See these words, and cuts under Belostoma and Ranatra.—2. Any one of certain true bugs of the heteropterous section Arocoris, including those which live mainly on the surface of the water, and which belong to the families Hydrobatidae, Veliidae, Limnabidae, Salidae, and Hydrometridae. See these words.—3. The croton-bug or German cockroach, Blatta (Phyllodromia) germanica; so called from its preference for water-pipes and moist places in houses. See cuts under croton-bug and Blattidae.—Giant water-bug, any member of the Belostomatidae.

water-butt (wá'tér-but), n. 1. A large open-headed cask, usually set up on end in an out-house or close to a dwelling, serving as a reservoir for rain- or pipe-water.—2. A water-beetle, as Dytiscus marginatus and related species.

water-cabbage (wá'tér-kab'āj), n. The American white water-lily, Castalia (Nymphaea) odorata.

water-calamint (wá'tér-kal'ā-nint), n. The corn-mint, Leucosiphon.

water-caltrop (wá'tér-kal'trop), n. 1. The water-nut, Trapa.—2. A book-name of the pondweeds Potamogeton densus and P. crispus.

water-can (wá'tér-kan), n. The yellow water-lily, Nymphaea (Naphar) lutea, or the European white water-lily, Castalia speciosa (Nymphaea alba): so named from the shape of the seed-vesicle. [Prov. Eng.]

water-cancer, water-canker (wá'tér-kan'sér, -kang'kér), n. Gangrenous stomatitis, or noma. See noma.

water-cap (wá'tér-kap), n. 1. A form of cylindrical diaphragm of copper in the time-fuse of a shell, intended to prevent the fuse from being extinguished by water in ricochet firing.—2. A bird of the subfamily Fluvicolinae, the species and genera of which are numerous. Also water-chat. See cut under Fluvicola.

water-carpet (wá'tér-kár'pet), n. 1. A British geometrid moth, Cidaria suffumata.—2. An American golden-saxifrage, Chrysosplenium americanum, which spreads on the surface of springs and streams. Wood, Class-book of Bot.

water-carriage (wá'tér-kar'āj), n. 1. Transportation or conveyance by water.

In the important matter of water-carriage the farmer in the Canadian Far West has unrivalled advantages.

W. F. Roe, Newfoundland to Manitoba, xiii.

2. The conducting or conveying of water from place to place.

In the water-carriage system each house has its own network of drain-pipes, soil pipes, and waste-pipes, which lead from the basins, sinks, closets, and gullies within and about the house to the common sewer. Encyc. Brit., XXI. 714.

3. Means of conveyance by water, collectively; vessels; boats. [Rare.]

The most brittle water-carriage was used among the Egyptians, who, as Strabo saith, would sail sometimes in boats made of earthenware.

Arbuthnot.

water-carrier (wá'tér-kar'ī-ēr), n. One who or that which carries water; specifically, an arrangement of wires or the like on which a bucket of water, raised from a well, etc., may be conveyed wherever required, as to a house.—Water-carriers' paralysis, paralysis of the musculospiral nerve.

water-cart (wá'tér-kürt), n. A cart carrying water for sale or for watering streets, gardens, etc. For the latter purpose the cart bears a large cask or tank containing water, which, by means of a tube or tubes perforated with holes, is sprinkled on roads and streets to prevent dust from rising, or in gardens to water plants.

water-cask (wá'tér-kask), n. A strong light cask used for transporting drinking-water, especially on sea-going ships. Compare water-tank and breaker.

water-caster (wá'tér-kás'tér), n. A physician who professed to discover the diseases of his patients by "casting" or examining their urine; commonly, a quack.

Wastes much in physick and her water-caster.

water-cat (wá'tér-kat), n. The nair, or Oriental otter, Lutra nair, translating a Mahratta name.

Back-swimming. Water-boatman (Notonecta undulata), dorsal view, three times natural size.

Water-bug (Limnabates lineatus), about three times natural size.

water-cavy (wá'tér-kā'vi), n. The capibara.

water-celery (wá'tér-sel'ē-ri), n. 1. The cursed crowfoot, Ranunculus sceleratus, of temperate Europe, Asia, and North America. It has a thick hollow stem a foot or two high, the lower leaves stalked and three-lobed, the petals small, and the carpels very numerous. The juice is very acrid, and is used by beggars to produce sores; but the plant is in some places eaten after boiling.

2. See Valisneria.

water-cell (wá'tér-sel), n. 1. One of several diverticula of the paunch of the camel, serving to store up water. See water-bag, 1.

These, the so-called water-cells, serve to strain off from the contents of the paunch, and to retain in store, a considerable quantity of water. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 328.

2. A voltaic cell in which the liquid is pure water.

water-centiped (wá'tér-sen'ti-ped), n. The dobs-on or hellgrammite. See cut under spraecler. [U. S.]

water-charger (wá'tér-ehār'jēr), n. A device for filling the water-passages of a pump, so that it may act promptly when started.

water-chat (wá'tér-chat), n. 1. A bird of the family Henicoridæ.—2. A South American tyrant-flycatcher of the subfamily Fluvicolinae, of which there are many genera and species; a water-cap. See cut under Fluvicola.

water-check (wá'tér-ehék), n. A check-valve for regulating a supply of water, as in the Gifford injector. E. H. Knight.

water-chestnut (wá'tér-ches'nut), n. See Trapa.

water-chevrotain (wá'tér-shev'ro-tān), n. An aquatic African traguline, Hyomyscus aquaticus, belonging to the family Tragulidae, and thus related to the kanchil and napu.

water-chicken (wá'tér-chik'en), n. The common gallinule, Gallinula galeata. Ralph and Bugg, 1886. [Oneida county, New York.]

water-chickweed (wá'tér-chik'wēd), n. 1. A small, smooth, and green tufted herb, Montia fontana, found throughout Europe, in northern Asia, from arctic America down the west coast to California, and in the Andes to their southern extremity. Also blinking-chickweed (which see).—2. A name for Callitriche verna and Stellaria (Malachium) aquatica.

water-chinkapin (wá'tér-ching'ka-pin), n. The American nelmbo, Nelumbo lutea, or primarily its edible nut-like seed; so named from the resemblance of the seeds to chinkapins. They are borne immersed in pits in the large top-shaped receptacle. Also waukapin, yoncopin.

water-cicada (wá'tér-si-kā'dä), n. A water-boatman.

water-clam (wá'tér-klam), n. A bivalve of the family Spondyliidae; a thorn-oyster. See cut under Spondylus.

water-clock (wá'tér-klok), n. A clepsydra. A clepsydra, or waterclock, which played upon flutes the hours of the night at a time when they could not be seen on the index. Dr. Barney, Hist. Musie, I. 512.

water-closet (wá'tér-kloz'et), n. A privy having some contrivance for carrying off the discharges through a waste-pipe below by the agency of water.

water-cock (wá'tér-kok), n. The kora, Gallinula cristata, a large dark gallinule of India, Ceylon, Java, and islands eastward, horned with a red caruncle on top of the head.

water-colly (wá'tér-kol'i), n. The water-ouzel, Cinclus aquaticus. [Prov. Eng.]

water-color (wá'tér-kul'ör), n. 1. Painting, especially artistic painting, with pigments for which water and not oil is used as a solvent.—2. A pigment adapted or prepared for painting in this method.

Some fine colour that may please the eye
Of tickle changelings and poor discontents: . . .
And never yet did insurrection want Such water-colours to impart his cause.

Shak., 1 Hen. IV., v. 1. 80.

Water-colours are sold in four forms, in cakes, pastilles, pans, and tubes.

Hanerton, Graphic Arts, xxii.

3. A painting executed by this method, or with pigments of this kind.

The Art Galleries opened every year, and, besides the National Gallery, there were the Society of British Artists, the Exhibition of Water Colours, and the British Institution in Pall Mall. W. Besant, Fifty Years Ago, p. 135.

Also used attributively in all senses.

water-colored (wá'tér-kul'örd), a. Of the color of water; like water. [Rare.]

The other [sort of cherry], which hangs on the branch like grapes, is water-colored within, of a faintish sweet, and greedily devoured by the small birds.

Beverley, Virginia, iv. ¶ 12.

water-coloring (wá'tér-kul'gr-ing), n. The use of water-colors, or work executed in water-colors or pigments of similar nature. [Trade use.]

The Dutch and rose pinks are sometimes used, but they cannot be relied upon in water-coloring.

Paper-hanger, p. 76.

water-colorist (wá'tér-kul'gr-ist), n. One who paints in water-colors.

water-comparator (wá'tér-kom'pá-rá-tor), n. An apparatus for comparing thermometers with a standard, consisting essentially of a reservoir containing water, with means for obtaining different temperatures and for maintaining the whole mass at the same temperature during a series of observations.

water-cooler (wá'tér-kó'ler), n. Any device for cooling water; especially, a vessel with non-conducting walls in which water for drinking is placed with ice. Such coolers are fitted with a faucet in the lower part, for drawing off the water. The effect of other coolers is due to evaporation through their porous walls. See olla, 3.

water-core (wá'tér-kór), n. 1. In foundry, a hollow core placed inside the mold, within which a current of cold water can be made to pass to absorb the heat and hasten the cooling of the casting; used especially to cool the bore of cast guns.—2. In some forms of ear-axe, a quantity of water in a hermetically closed cavity, intended to take up heat from the journals.—3. A blemish, common in some varieties of the apple, in which the flesh about the core assumes a watery, translucent appearance.

watercourse (wá'tér-kórs), n. 1. A stream of water; a river or brook.

The woods climb up boldly along the hillsides, overshadowing every little dingle and watercourse.
Hickie, Geol. Sketches, iii.

2. A channel or canal made for the conveyance of water, or serving for conveyance by water.

Who hath divided a watercourse for the overflowing of waters.
Job xxxviii, 25.

Scouring the water-courses thorough the cities;
A fine periphery of a kennel-raker.

Fletcher (and another?), Prophetess, iii, 1.

3. In law, a stream of water, usually flowing in a definite channel having a bed and sides or banks, and usually discharging itself into some other stream or body of water. Bigelow. The condition of being occasionally dry does not deprive it of the character of a watercourse; but occasional flows of water caused by unusual rains, or melting of snow, and following a channel which is usually dry, do not constitute a watercourse. The owner of a watercourse has, within certain limits, a right to have it flow substantially unimpaired by the owners above and below. A grant of a watercourse may mean a grant of (1) the easement or the right to the running of water; (2) the channel which contains the water, the pipe, or drain; or (3) the land over which the water flows. George Jessel, Master of the Rolls.

water-cow (wá'tér-kou), n. The common domestic Indian buffalo, Bos bubalus or Bubalus bubalis; the water-buffalo; so called by English residents in translating a Chinese name, from the habit it has of seeking the water to escape the annoyance of insects. It is not a distinct species. The same habit is strongly marked in the African or Cape buffalo, B. capensis, and may be observed of domestic cattle anywhere. See cuts under buffalo.

water-cracker (wá'tér-krak'ér), n. 1. A water-biscuit.—2. A Prince Rupert's drop. See detonating bulb, under detonating.

A water cracker, as they [Prince Rupert's drops] are called in the factory.
Sci. Amer., N. S., LVI, 181.

water-craft (wá'tér-kráft), n. Vessels and boats plying on water.

water-crake (wá'tér-krák), n. 1. The common spotted crake of Europe, Porzana porzana; distinguished from the land-crake, Oxyechus palustris.—2. The water-rail, Rallus aquaticus, Montagu.—3. The water-ouzel; a misnomer. Whitby; Ray. [Local, Eng.]

water-crane (wá'tér-krán), n. 1. An apparatus for supplying water from an elevated tank, as to the tender of a locomotive.—2. A crane operated by hydraulic power.

water-cress (wá'tér-kres), n. [< ME. waterkresse, waterkress, waterkirs; < water + cress.] A creeping herb of springs and streams, Nasturtium officinale, from antiquity used as a spring salad, and now very widely cultivated. See cress and Nasturtium (with cut). The name is extended to the genus—N. palustre, a weedy species, being called marsh or yellow water-cress, or marsh-cress.

water-crow (wá'tér-krō), n. 1. The common European coot, Falco atra; from its blackish plumage. [Local, Eng.]—2. The water-ouzel, Cinclus aquaticus. [Local, Eng.]—3. The darter, snake-bird, or water-turkey, Platys aninga. [Southern U. S.]

water-crowfoot (wá'tér-krō'fūt), n. The name of several aquatic species of Ranunculus, primarily R. aquatilis, the common white water-crowfoot, a plant found through the north temperate zone and in Australia. The yellow water-crowfoot is R. multifidus.

watercup (wá'tér-kup), n. 1. The pennywort, Hydrocotyle; by translation of the genus name.—2. The trumpetleaf, Sarracenia flava.

water-cure (wá'tér-kúr), n. Hydrotherapy or balneotherapy; a system of medical treatment by means of water in any form or mode of application.

water-deck (wá'tér-dek), n. A painted piece of canvas used for covering the saddle and bridle, girths, etc., of a dragoon's horse. [Eng.]

water-deer (wá'tér-dēr), n. 1. A small Chinese musk-deer, Hydropotes inermis, of somewhat aquatic habits. It resembles the ordinary musk-deer in general, being of small size, hornless in both sexes, and with protrusive upper canines in the male; but some technical characters cause it to fall in another genus.

Chinese Water-deer (Hydropotes inermis).

2. The African water-chevrotain. This is a traguloid, quite different from the foregoing.

water-deerlet (wá'tér-dēr'let), n. The African water-chevrotain.

water-devil (wá'tér-dev'vī), n. 1. The larva or grub of various aquatic insects, as of the genus Hydophilus. H. picus is a common British species.—2. The dobson or hellgrammite. See Corydalis, and cut under sprawler. [U. S.]

water-dock (wá'tér-dok), n. A tall dock, Rumex Hydrolapathum, of temperate Europe and Asia. Also called horse- or water-sorrel. R. aquatilis also appears under this name. The great or American water-dock is R. Britannica (R. orbiculatus).

water-doctor (wá'tér-dok'tor), n. 1. A hydropathist. [Colloq.]—2. One of a former school of medical practitioners the members of which pretended that all diseases could be diagnosed by simple inspection of the urine.

water-dog (wá'tér-dog), n. 1. A dog accustomed to or delighting in the water, or trained to go into the water in pursuit of game, as a water-spaniel.—2. One of various kinds of large salamanders; a mud-puppy. See axolotl, Mecopoma, and cut under hellbender. Also water-puppy.—3. A small, irregular, floating cloud in a rainy season, supposed to indicate rain. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

Water-dogs, . . . dark clouds that seem to travel through the air by themselves, and indicate a storm. Halliwell makes them identical with mares-tails, but they are distinct things in Surrey language.

G. L. Gower, Surrey Provincialisms (Eng. Dial. Soc.).

4. A sailor, especially an old sailor; a salt; one thoroughly accustomed to life in and on the water. [Colloq.]

The Sandwich Islanders are complete water-dogs, and therefore very good in boating.

R. H. Dana, Jr., Before the Mast, p. 91.

water-dragon (wá'tér-drag'on), n. An old name of the water-urn, Calla palustris, also assigned to Calla palustris, perhaps by confusion of the Latin names. Britten and Holland.

water-drain (wá'tér-drán), n. A drain or channel through which water may run.

water-drainage (wá'tér-drá'nāj), n. The draining off of water.

water-dressing (wá'tér-dres'ing), n. The constant application of water to a wound, by immersion, irrigation, or compresses.

water-drink (wá'tér-dríngk), n. [< ME. water-drinch; < water + drink.] A drink of water.

Alls iff thu drinnke waterdrinche.

Orandum (ed. White), l. 11482.

water-drinker (wá'tér-dríng kēr), n. [< ME. water drynkare; < water + drinker.] 1. A drinker of water.

Water drinkare. Aquibibus. Prompt. Parv., p. 518.

2. An advocate of abstinence from intoxicating liquors; a prohibitionist. [Colloq.]

water-drip (wá'tér-drip), n. A pan or receptacle to receive the waste water from a water-cooler. Car-Bulder's Dict.

water-drop (wá'tér-drop), n. A drop of water; specifically, a tear.

Let not women's weapons, water-drops, Stain my man's cheeks! Shak. Lear, ii, l. 280.

water-dropper (wá'tér-drop'ér), n. A contrivance devised by Sir William Thomson, and used particularly in the measurement of the electrical potential of the atmosphere. It consists of an insulated metallic cylinder containing water, with a projecting nozzle, from which the water is allowed to drop freely. Each drop carries with it a small charge, and finally the spout and connecting-rod gain the potential of the air; this may then be measured by a quadrant electrometer.

water-droppwort (wá'tér-drop'wért), n. The umbelliferous plant Oenanthe fistulosa, or any plant of that genus. The hemlock water-droppwort is the highly poisonous O. crocata.

water-dust (wá'tér-dust), n. A collective name for the extremely minute droplets or particles of water which compose clouds and haze. [Rare.]

water-eagle (wá'tér-ē gl), n. The fish-hawk or osprey. [Rare.]

watered (wá'tér'd), a. Marked with or exhibiting waved lines or bands bearing some resemblance to those which might be produced by the action of water. Also watered. Watered silk, silk upon which a wave-like and changeable pattern has been produced by moistening and pressure. The name is sometimes restricted to material of which the pattern is confined to parallel lines, as distinguished from moire antique. See moire and moiré.

water-elder (wá'tér-el'dér), n. The guelder-rose, Viburnum Opulus.

water-elephant (wá'tér-el'ē-fant), n. The hippopotamus or river-horse.

water-elevator (wá'tér-el'ē-vá-tor), n. 1. Any device for raising buckets in wells, or for lifting water to a higher level for purposes of irrigation, etc.—2. A lift or elevator in which the operating force is the weight or pressure of water; a hydraulic elevator.

water-elm (wá'tér-elm), n. The common white elm, Ulmus Americana.

water-engine (wá'tér-en'jin), n. An engine to raise water; also, an engine propelled by water.

waterer (wá'tér-ér), n. 1. One who waters, in any sense of the word; as, a stock-waterer.

Neither the planter nor the waterer have any power to make it [religion] take root and grow in your hearts.

Locke, Paraphrase on 1 Cor. iii, 7.

2. That with which one waters; a vessel, utensil, or other contrivance for sprinkling water on plants, watering animals, etc.

water-eringo (wá'tér-ē-ring gō), n. A plant, Eryngium yuccifolium (E. aquaticum), otherwise called button-snakeroot. See Eryngium.

water-ermine (wá'tér-ēr min), n. A British tiger-moth, Spilosoma urtica, chiefly white and yellow marked with black. [Eng.]

water-extractor (wá'tér-eks-trak tor), n. In dyeing, a rotatory apparatus for freeing dyed goods from water by the action of centrifugal force.

waterfall (wá'tér-fál), n. [= D. waterfal = G. Wasserfall (cf. Sw. vattenfall, Dan. randfald); as water + fall.] 1. A steep fall or flow of water from a height; a cascade; a cataract.

Down shower the gambolling waterfalls.

Tempsom, Sea-Fairies.

2. A neck-tie or scarf with long drooping ends. [Colloq.]

He was suddenly confronted in the walk by Benjamin, the Jew money-lender, smoking a cigar, and dressed in a gaudily-furnished suit waistcoat and waterfall of the same material.

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Oxford, II, iii.

3. A chignon. [Colloq.]

The brown silk net, which she had supposed thoroughly trustworthy, had given way all at once into a great hole under the waterfall, and the soft hair would not tuck itself through and threaten to stray untidily.

Mrs. Whitney, Le-hé Goldthwaite, iii.

water-farming (wá'tér-fár'ming), n. The cultivation of plants growing in water.

A few miles away, the native lotus grows luxuriantly, a relic, it is believed, of Indian water-farming.

Harp's Mag., LXXVIII, 850.

water-feather, water-featherfoil (wá'tér-féth'ér, féth'ér-foil), n. The featherfoil or water-violet Hottonia, especially the British species H. palustris; so named from its finely dissected immersed leaves.

water-fern (wá'tér-férn), n. 1. A fern of the genus Osmunda; specifically, O. regalis.—2. A plant of the order Marsileaceae.

water-fight (wá'tér-fít), n. A naval battle. [Rare.]

Cæsar . . . awaits at anchor the coming of his whole fleet, mean while with his legatus and tribuns consulting, and giving order to fit all things for what might happen in such a various and floating water-fight as was to be expected. Milton, Hist. Eng., ii.

water-figwort (wá'tér-fíg'wért), n. The common European figwort, Scrophularia nodosa.

water-filter (wá'tér-fíl'tér), n. An appliance for filtering water; a filter.—Water-filter nut. Same as clearing nut.

water-finder (wá'tér-fin'dér), n. One who practises rhabdomancy, or uses the divining-rod to discover water; a letonist.

water-fire (wá'tér-fír), n. [Tr. of a Tamil name.] A low weed, Bergia ammannioides of the Elatinaceae, found in rice-fields and marshy grounds in the tropical Old World. The name alludes to a supposed acidity.

water-flag (wá'tér-flág), n. The yellow flag, Iris Pseudacorus. Also called yellow iris and flower-de-luce.

water-flannel (wá'tér-flan'el), n. A felt-like substance composed of the matted filaments of some conferva or similar alga which multiplies in submerged meadows, and is deposited by the retreating waters.

water-flaxseed (wá'tér-flaks'séd), n. The larger duckweed, Lemna polyrrhiza; so called from the shape and minute size of the fronds.

water-flea (wá'tér-flé), n. One of numerous small or minute crustaceans which skip about in the water like fleas, as Daphnia pulex; any branchiopod. See Daphniidae, Cladocera, Cyclops.

water-float (wá'tér-flót), n. A float placed in a boiler, cistern, etc., to control a valve.

water-flood (wá'tér-flúd), n. [< ME. waterflood, < AS. waterflōd; as water + flood.] A flood of water; an inundation.

Let not the waterflood overflow me. Ps. lxxx. 15.

In the month of May, namely on the 20 day, came downe great water floods, by reason of sodaine showres of haile and raime. Stow, Annals, p. 768.

water-flounder (wá'tér-flóun'dér), n. The sand-flounder. [Local, U. S.]

waterflow (wá'tér-flō), n. A flow or current of water; the amount of water flowing.

The work concludes with articles on the cost of hydraulic power, and upon meters for measuring waterflow. Westminster Rev., CXXVII. 247.

water-flowing (wá'tér-flō ing), a. Flowing like water; streaming. [Rare.]

My mercy dried their water-flowing tears. Shak., 3 Hen. VI., iv. 8. 43.

water-fly (wá'tér-flí), n. 1. Some winged aquatic insect; specifically, a member of the family Perleidae; a stone-fly.—2. A source of petty annoyance; an insignificant but troublesome person or thing. [Rare.]

How the poor world is pestered with such waterflies, diminutives of nature! Shak., T. and C., v. 1. 38.

water-foot (wá'tér-füt), n. One of the ambulacral pedicels of an echinoderm; a tube-foot.

water-fowl (wá'tér-fóul), n. [< ME. watyr fowl; water + fowl.] 1. Same as water-birds.—2. In a restricted sense, swimming birds, especially those which, as the Anseres, are used for food or for any reason engage the attention of sportsmen.

water-fox (wá'tér-foks), n. The carp, Cyprinus carpio; so called from its supposed cunning. L. Walton, Compleat watershop.

water-frame (wá'tér-frám), n. The original spinning-frame invented by Arkwright, which was driven by water-power (whence the name). Otherwise called throstle and throstle-frame. See cut in next column.

water-fright (wá'tér-frít), n. Hydrophobia.

water-fringe (wá'tér-frínj), n. See Limonium thymum.

water-furrow (wá'tér-fúr'ú, v. [< ME. water-furrow, waterfoore; water + furrow.] In agr., a deep furrow made for conducting water from ground and keeping it dry; an open drain.

Waterfurrows, in lands. Eliens, subent.

Prompt. Parv., p. 518.

Arkwright's Water frame.

water-furrow (wá'tér-fúr'ú), v. t. [< water-furrow, n.] To plow or open water-furrows in; drain by means of water-furrows.

Seed husbandly sown, water-furrow thy ground,
That rain when it cometh may run away round.
Tusser, October's Husbandry, st. 7.

water-gage (wá'tér-gāj), n. 1. Any device for indicating the height of water in a reservoir, tank, boiler, or other vessel.

The most common form is a glass tube placed on the front of a boiler, and connected at the top with a pipe opening into the steam-space above the water and below with a pipe opening into the water in the boiler. The water and steam fill the tube and indicate the height of the water in the boiler. See gage-cock. Also called water-indicator.

2. A wall or bank to restrain or hold back water.

water-gall (wá'tér-gál), n. [Also dial. water-gaul, water-gull; = G. wasser-galle, a cavity in the earth made by a torrent, a bog, quagmire, < wasser, water, + galle, seen also in G. regen-galle, an imperfect rainbow, end or fragment of a rainbow, an oxeye, water-gall, weather-gall, appar, in orig, like Icel. galli, a defect, flaw, hence a barren spot; see gall².]

1. A cavity made in the earth by a torrent of water. Imp. Diet.—2. An appearance in the sky regarded as presaging the approach of rain; a rainbow-colored spot; an imperfectly formed or a secondary rainbow. Also called weather-gall.

And round about her tear-distained eye
Blue circles stream'd, like rainbows in the sky;
These water-galls in her dim element
Foretell new storms. Shak., Lucrece, l. 1588.

Their reason is but a low, obscure, and imperfect shadow thereof, as the water-gall is of the rainbow.

Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 50.

I am told a second rainbow above the first is called in the Isle of Wight a watergall.

Halliwel (under water-dogs).

water-gang (wá'tér-gang), n. A trench or course for conveying a stream of water; a mill-race. Jameson. [Obsolete or Scotch.]

water-gas (wá'tér-gás), n. A gas, non-luminous in its pure form, derived in part from the decomposition of steam. The apparatus for making it consists of a furnace for anthracite coal or other fuel, connected at the top with a tower filled with loose brick and called a regenerator. The products of combustion pass through the regenerator, and raise it to a white heat. Steam is then admitted below the furnace, and passing upward through the fire and through the regenerator, is decomposed. While the steam is passing the furnace, either coal reduced to dust or crude naphtha is allowed to fall through the ascending steam over the fire. Complicated chemical reactions take place, the result being the formation of quantities of fixed gas. There are also other methods closely allied to this. By one process the non-luminous gas is afterward enriched by the addition of a hydrocarbon, as petroleum or naphtha. Water-gas is commonly thus treated, and used as an illuminating gas; but it is also used, in its non-luminous form, as a heating gas for cooking and other purposes.

water-gate (wá'tér-gát), n. [ME. watergate; < water + gate.] 1. A gateway through which water passes, or a gate by which it may be excluded or confined; a flood-gate.

From heaven, out of the watergates,
The reiny storme felle downe algaits.

Gower, Conf. Amant., iii.

2. A gate by which access is gained to a river, fountain, well, or other body or supply of water.

And at the fountain gate . . . they went up by the stairs of the city of David, at the going up of the wall, above the house of David, even unto the water gate eastward. Neh. xii. 37.

As they reached the water-gate, the rain had ceased for a time, and a gleam of sunlight shone upon the river, and rested on the Queen's barge as it approached.

J. H. Shorthouse, John Inglesant, iv.

3. A water-plug or valve. E. H. Knight.

water-gavel (wá'tér-gav'el), n. In Eng. law, a rent paid for fishing or any other benefit derived from a river.

water-germander (wá'tér-jér-man'dér), n. A plant, Teucrium Scordium.

water-gilder (wá'tér-gil'dér), n. One who practises the art of water-gilding.

water-gilding (wá'tér-gil'ding), n. Same as wash-gilding.

water-gillyflower (wá'tér-jil'i-flou-ér), n. The water-violet, Hottonia palustris.

water-gladiol (wá'tér-glád'i-ól), n. See flow-ering rush (under *rush*¹).

water-glass (wá'tér-glás), n. 1. A water-clock or clepsydra.

Full time of defence measured by the water-glass.

Gröte, Hist. Greece, ii. 72.

2. An instrument for making observations beneath the surface of water, consisting of a tube with a glass bottom; a water-telescope.

With a water-glass over the side, you look down on the bright array of fishes, whose every movement you can note. Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XXXIX. 180.

3. Same as soluble glass (which see, under glass).

Water-glass painting may be explained . . . very briefly. It is simply water-colour on dry plaster, fixed afterwards with a solution of flint applied to it in spray as the solution of gum-lac is applied to a charcoal drawing.

Hamerton, Graphic Arts, p. 236.

water-glue (wá'tér-glō), n. Waterproof glue.

The strings [of bows] being made of verie good hempe, with a kinde of waterglewe to resist wet and moisture.

Sir J. Smyth, quoted in Ellis's Lit. Letters, p. 54.

water-god (wá'tér-god), n. In myth., a deity that presides over the waters, or over some particular body, stream, or fountain of water.

water-grampus (wá'tér-gram'pus), n. Same as grampus, 4.

water-grass (wá'tér-grás), n. 1. The manna-grass, Glyceria fluitans. [Fishermen's name.]

—2. A very succulent grass, Paspalum lave. [Southern U. S.]—3. The water-erect, Nasturtium officinale. [Ireland.]—4. Species of Equisetum.—5. The velvet-grass, Holcus. Britten and Holland. [Prov. Eng.]

water-gruel (wá'tér-grō'el), n. Gruel made of water and meal, flour, etc., and eaten without milk; thin or weak gruel.

I could eat water-gruel with thee a month for this jest, my dear rogue. E. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, ii. 1.

Was ever Tartar fierce or cruel

Upon the Strength of Water-Gruel?

Prior, Alma, iii.

water-guard (wá'tér-gärd), n. A river or harbor police; customs officers detailed to watch ships in order to prevent smuggling or other violations of law.

water-gull (wá'tér-gul), n. A dialectal form of water-gull.

water-gum (wá'tér-gum), n. A small tree of New South Wales, Tristania nerifolia, the timber of which is close-grained and elastic, and valuable for boat-building.

water-gut (wá'tér-gut), n. An alga of the genus Uva, natural order Ulvaceae. The most general form, U. enteromorpha, var. intestinalis, occurs in fresh as well as salt water. U. enteromorpha, var. compressa, being the more common on tidal rocks. When floating in the water these plants very much resemble the intestines of an animal (whence the name).

water-hairgrass (wá'tér-här'grás), n. A grass, Catabrosa aquatica, growing in shallow water, widely in the north temperate zone, having a panicle with many half-whorls of slender branches. Also water-whorlgrass.

water-hammer (wá'tér-ham'ér), n. 1. The concussion of a moving volume of water in a pipe or passage, caused by sudden stoppage of flow, as by the abrupt closing of a faucet.—2. The noise, resembling a blow of a hammer, caused by the presence of water in a steam-pipe when live steam is passed through it.—3. A philosophical toy consisting of a hermetically sealed tube from which the air has been exhausted and which contains some water. It is so called because the water strikes against the tube with a noise similar to that of a hammer, there being no air to impede its motion.

4. A metal hammer heated in a flame or in boiling water. Tapping the skin with this hammer for a few seconds will cause a blister. It is used as a counter-irritant or a mild canter.

water-hare (wá'tér-hár), n. 1. The water-rabbit. See cut under swamp-hare.—2. The spotted eavy, or paca, Caloglyphus paca.

water-haze (wá'tér-ház), n. Haze composed of water-particles, as distinguished from haze consisting mainly of particles of dust and organic matter. See haze.

water-heater (wá'tér-hé'tér), n. A heating-apparatus which performs its functions by the agency of hot water.

water-hemlock (wá'tér-hem'lok), n. 1. See Cicuta.—2. The hemlock water-dropwort, Enanthe crocata, otherwise called dead-tongue; also O. Phellandrium, distinguished as fine-leaved water-hemlock.

water-hemp (wá'tér-hemp), n. 1. See hemp.—2. The hemp-agrimony, Eupatorium cannabinum.

water-hen (wá'tér-hen), n. Some aquatic bird likened to a hen. (a) The moor-hen or gallinule of Great Britain, Gallinula chloropus. (b) The American coot, Fulica americana. [Massachusetts.] (c) An Australian bird of the rail family and genus Tringoides. See cut under Tringoides, and compare water-cock.—Spotted water-hen. Same as spotted rail. See rail. [Local, Eng.]

water-hickory (wá'tér-hik'ō-ri), n. Same as bitter pecan (which see, under pecan).

water-hoarhound (wá'tér-hör'hound), n. A plant of the genus Lycopus, chiefly L. Europæus.

water-hog (wá'tér-hog), n. 1. The African river-hog, Potamocharius penicillatus. See cut under Potamocharius.—2. The South American capibara, Hydrochoreus capibara. Also called tailless hippopotamus and short-nosed tapir.

water-hole (wá'tér-höl), n. A hole or hollow where water collects. In Australia, a small natural or artificial reservoir; in South Africa, a natural pool, or water-pool. This word is chiefly used in Australia, where it means a small pond or pool of water, and especially such as are filled during the rainy season and dry up when that ceases, or soon after.

In the dry weather, as the small lagoons and water-holes scattered all over the country [Australia] get low and dried up, large numbers of . . . wild ducks congregate on the big lagoon in front of Mount Spencer station. H. F. Hutton, Advance Australia, p. 88.

We have been drafting close here up at the one-eyed waterhole. Mrs. Campbell Præd, The Head-Station, p. 84.

waterhole (wá'tér-höl), v. i.: pret. and pp. waterholed, pyr. waterholing. [< water-hole, n.] In coffee-cultivation. See the quotation.

A third operation is called "trenching" or waterholing. The trenches are made across the slope, and . . . the holes are left open to act as catch-drains, and as receptacles for wash, weeds, prunings, and other vegetable matters. Spens' Encege. Manuf., l. 628.

water-horse (wá'tér-hórs), n. Same as horse-pile.

water-horsetail (wá'tér-hórs'tāl), n. A plant of the genus Chara.

water-house† (wá'tér-hóus), n. A house or dwelling upon the water; a ship.

The thing by her commanded is to see Dover's dreadful cliff; passing, in a poor water-house, the dangers of the merciless channel 'twixt that and Calais, five long hours' sail, with three poor weeks' victuals. Beaun. and Fl., Scornful Lady, l. 1.

water-hyssop (wá'tér-his'op), n. See Herpestis.

water-ice (wá'tér-ís), n. A preparation of water and sugar, flavored and frozen; a sherbet.

water-inch (wá'tér-inch), n. In hydraul., a measure of water equal to the quantity discharged in 24 hours through a circular opening of 1 inch diameter leading from a reservoir, under the least pressure—that is, when the water is only so high as just to cover the orifice. This quantity is very nearly 500 cubic feet.

water-indicator (wá'tér-in'di-ká-tor), n. A device for indicating the weight of water in a boiler or a tank, or for giving an alarm by permitting steam to escape, sounding a whistle, etc., when the water falls below a certain level; a water-gage.

wateriness (wá'tér-i-nes), n. The state of being watery. Arbutinol.

watering (wá'tér-ing), n. [< late ME. watryng, watering (= MEG. watering = MHG. wæzzernge, G. wässerung); verbal n. of water, v.] 1. The act of one who waters, in any sense.

Both not each one of you on the sabbath loose his ox or his ass from the stall, and lead him away to watering? Luke xiii. 15.

The clouds are for the watering of the earth. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 168.

Specifically—2. The art or process of giving to the surface of anything a wave-like or veined appearance of somewhat ornamental effect; also, the marking so produced. Compare water,

v. t., 3, and watered silk (under watered).—3. A watering-place; as, "the watering of Saint Thomas" (better known as St. Thomas a Watering), Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 826.—4. In flor.-manuf., same as retting, l.—Watering of the mouth, an abundant secretion of saliva excited, through a reflex nervous influence, by the suggestion, smell, or sight of appetizing food.

watering-call (wá'tér-ing-kál), n. Milit., a call or sound of a trumpet on which cavalry assemble to water their horses.

watering-can (wá'tér-ing-kan), n. Same as watering-pot.

watering-cart (wá'tér-ing-kárt), n. 1. A barrel or cistern mounted on wheels, used for watering plants. Various special forms are made, as one for watering plants in drills, the water escaping through perforated pipes set at the proper distances apart.

2. A large tank, of whatever form, mounted on a wagon-body, used for watering streets.

watering-house (wá'tér-ing-hóus), n. A house or tavern where water is obtained for cab-horses, etc. Compare waterman, 2.

Carriages . . . roll swiftly by; watermen, . . . who have been shouting and rushing about for the last two hours, retire to their watering-houses, to solace themselves with the creature comforts of pipes and purf. Dickens, Sketches, Scenes, ii.

watering-place (wá'tér-ing-plás), n. [< ME. watryng-place; < watering + place.] 1. A place where water may be obtained, as for drinking, for watering cattle, or for supplying ships.

Watryng Place, where bestys byn wateryd. Prompt. Parv., p. 518.

The force will have to trust to known watering-places where there are wells. Col. Farquhar, in E. Sartorius's In the Soudan, p. 56.

2. Especially, a place of resort for a particular kind of water, as mineral water; a well, spring, town, etc., famous for its waters; in later use, a bathing-place; a seaside resort; loosely, any summer resort.

The discovery of a saline spring . . . suggested to a too constructive brain the possibility of turning Treby Magna into a fashionable watering-place.

George Eliot, Felix Holt, iii.

The term (watering-places) was naturally extended to include places resorted to for sea bathing, and sometimes, as at Scarborough, the visitors could either have the benefit of the spa or the salt water, that famous watering-place having both of these attractions.

N. and Q., 7th ser., VII. 378.

watering-pot (wá'tér-ing-pot), n. 1. A vessel, usually a somewhat tall can, most often of cylindrical section, sometimes oval, with a long spout springing from near the base, used for watering plants and for other similar purposes, as sprinkling sidewalks. The spout is generally fitted with a rose, often movable, for distributing the water in a number of fine streams. It is usually made of tin-plate or galvanized sheet-iron, and is intended to be managed by hand. Also called watering-can.

2. In conch., any species of the genus Aspergillum, as A. vaginiferum. These are true bivalves of the family Gastrochætidæ (or Tubicolitidæ), not distantly related to the terebros, and all bore into hard substances. The valves proper are very small in comparison with the long hard tube with which they are soldered. The species named has this tube cylindrical and clubbed or knobbed at both ends, with one end closed by a perforated plate, the whole formation suggesting the sprinkler of a watering-pot. It inhabits the Red Sea, and other species of Aspergillum are found in Indo-Pacific waters. Also called watering-pot shell.

watering-trough (wá'tér-ing-tróf), n. A trough in which water is provided for domestic animals.

water-injector (wá'tér-in-jek'tor), n. See injector.

waterish (wá'tér-ish), a. [Formerly also waterish; *< ME. waterish, < AS. water-ise; as water + -ish.] 1. Abounding in or containing water; sprinkled, moistened, or diluted with water; watery; aqueous.

Frost is wheresoever is any waterish humour, as is in all woods, either more or less; and you know that all things frozen and icy will rather break than bend. Ascham, Toxophilus (ed. 1864), p. 115.

Not all the dukes of waterish Burgundy Can buy this unprized precious maid of me. Shak., Lear, i. 1. 261.

2. Consisting mainly of water; hence, thin; weak; poor.

Such nice and waterish diet. Shak., Othello, iii. 3. 15.

3. Juicy; succulent. [Rare.]

The Summer

Invited my then ranging eyes to look on Large fields of ripen'd corn, presenting trilles Of waterish pette dainties.

Dekker and Ford, Sun's Darling, iv.

4. Pertaining to water, or having something of its characters; insipid; as, a waterish color or feel.

Some [flowers] of a sad or darke Greene, some waterish, blunkette, gray, grassie, hoarie, and Lecke coloured.

Touchevour of Complexions, p. 100, of waterish taste, the flesh not firme, like English beefe. Hakluyt's Voyages, l. 386.

waterishness (wá'tér-ish-nes), n. The state or character of being waterish.

Waterishness, which is like the serosity of our blood. Floyer.

water-jacket (wá'tér-jak'et), n. A casing containing water placed about something to keep it cool, or otherwise regulate its temperature. Compare water-mantle and water-box.

water-joint (wá'tér-jóint), n. A joint through which water will not leak, as in the framework of a water-gate, the junction of two water-pipes, the gates of canal-locks, etc.

water-junket (wá'tér-jung'ket), n. The common sandpiper of Great Britain, Tringoides hypoleucos.

water-kelpie (wá'tér-kel'pi), n. A spirit or demon supposed to dwell in water. See kelpie.

The bonny grey mare did sweat for fear, For she heard the water-kelpie roaring.

Annals Water (Child's Ballads, II. 189).

water-kind† (wá'tér-kind), n. [< ME. water-kinde; < water + kind.] Water; the elements of water.

Latin boe se33th þatt Ennon Bitacnethth waterkinde. Ormulum (ed. White), l. 1807.

water-lade (wá'tér-lád), n. A channel or trench for conducting water; a drain; a gutter.

The channels were not skoured . . . for riverets and Brookes to passe away, but the water-lades stopped up either through negligence or depopulation.

water-laid (wá'tér-lád), a. Noting three ropes laid into one: same as cable-laid.

Waterlander (wá'tér-lan'dér), n. [< D. Waterland, a district in North Holland, + -erl.] One of the liberal wing of the Mennonites of the Netherlands. Beginning with less strict views of ex-communication than those of the conservative wing, they gradually moved in the direction of still greater liberality, exchanged the name of Mennonites for Doopsgezinden (Baptist persuasion), refused to condemn any one for opinions which the Bible did not expressly pronounce essential to salvation, cooperated with William the Silent, and even accepted civil office. The division between them and their opponents gradually disappeared, and the two wings are now united in Holland on substantially the liberal basis of the Waterlanders. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 12.

Waterlandian (wá'tér-lan'di-an), n. [< Waterland (see Waterlander) + -ian.] Same as Waterlander.

water-language (wá'tér-lang'gwäj), n. Jocular abuse; chaff. [Rare.]

'Twas all water-language at these times, and no exceptions were to be taken. Amhurst, Terra Filius, No. 1.

water-laverock (wá'tér-lav'er-ok), n. Same as sandy laverock (which see, under laverock).

water-leader† (wá'tér-lé'dér), n. [< ME. water-leader (cf. D. waterleiding = G. wasserleitung = Sw. vattenledning = Dan. vandledning, aqueduct); < water + leader.] A water-carrier.

The corks and water-leaders. York Plays, p. 207.

waterleaf (wá'tér-lét), n. 1. Any plant of the genus Hydrophyllum (which see).—2. Paper in the first stage of manufacture, after it has been pressed between the felts; a technical use.

The structure of the waterleaf may be regarded as an interlacement of vegetable fibres in every direction. Ure, Dict., III. 514.

water-leech† (wá'tér-léch), n. [< ME. water-leche, waterleche; < water + leech.] Same as horse-leech.

*Waterleech*is two ben dogtris, seicliche. Bring on, bring on. Wycht, Prov., xxx. 15.

water-leg (wá'tér-leg), n. In steam-boilers, a vertical water-space connecting other water-spaces, and crossing a flue-space, by which its contents are heated.

water-lemon (wá'tér-lém-on), n. A species of passion-flower, Passiflora laurifolia, native in the West Indies and tropical South America, and cultivated there and in other warm countries; also, and primarily, its fruit. The latter is lemon-colored, oval in form, of the size of a peach, having a soft skin, and a very juicy pulp of a pleasant subacid flavor. The vine has the leaves entire, the flowers white with red blotches, the crown violet with white streaks. P. multiflora, the sweet calabash, with a smaller fruit of similar flavor, is sometimes included under the name. The wild water-lemon is P. foetida, (otherwise called) (West Indian) lure-in-a-must, bearing a delicate fruit of the size of a small cherry, but having ill-smelling leaves.

water-lens (wá'tér-lénz), n. A simple kind of lens, formed by a few drops of water placed in a small brass cell with blackened sides, and having a glass bottom. The upper surface of the lens is more or less curved according to the diameter of the tube, and sometimes the convexity (and hence the magnifying power) can be raised by a screw at the side.

water-lentil (wá'tér-len tîl), n. See lentil.

waterless (wá'tér-less), a. [ME. waterles, waterless, without water; as water + -less.] Lacking water; unsupplied or unmoistened with water; of a fish, out of water.

A monk whom he is reccheless
Is likened til a fish that is waterless.

Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 180.

Frankincense, for which of old they went Through plain and desert waterless, and faced
The lion-haunted woods that edged the waste.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, III. 217.

water-lettuce (wá'tér-let'is), n. See Pistia.

water-level (wá'tér-lev'el), n. 1. The surface of the water in any vessel or reservoir, natural or artificial, in which water is standing, as in a well, canal, pond, lake, etc.; also, the plane of saturation beneath the surface of the ground, or the plane below which the soil or rock remains saturated with water under the ordinary conditions of rainfall, etc.

But in strata occupying such a position, as well as in the gravel, all wells must be sunk by digging, and not bored, to the natural water-level, there being no superincumbent impermeable stratum to keep down the water at a level below that to which it would naturally have a tendency to rise.

Prestwich, Water-Bearing Strata of London, p. 6.

2. A leveling-instrument in which water is employed instead of mercury or spirit of wine. It consists of a tin tube, about 3 feet long, bent at right angles at each end, with a small short tube soldered on it at its center, by the aid of which it can be fixed upon some kind of a support or tripod. In the bent ends of the long tube are inserted two small glass vials with their bottoms cut off. Enough water is then poured in to about half fill the bottles when the instrument is level. By sighting across the surface of the water a level-line is got. The extreme cheapness and portability of this level make it serviceable sometimes, although it gives but a rough approximation to accuracy as compared with the best kind of spirit-level.

water-lily (wá'tér-lî'i), n. [ME. watir-lili, watyr-lyly; < water + lily.] 1. A plant of the genus Nymphaea, which contains about 25 species distributed nearly throughout the world, but most freely in the northern hemisphere and the tropics. They are aquatic plants with a perennial rootstock, orbicular floating leaves, and large flowers, single on long scapes rising on the surface of the water. The flowers have numerous petals of a delicate texture, forming when expanded nearly a hemisphere—white, blue, red, or yellow. Several white water-lilies are the most familiar. The common European species is C. speciosa (N. alba), with leaves 6 or 8 and flowers 3 or 4 inches in diameter. The ordinary American species is C. (N.) odorata, with very sweet-scented flowers often 5 inches wide, and leaves 5 to 9 inches broad, varying in color to pinkish or even bright pink-red, especially at Barnstable, Massachusetts. In the interior United States is found C. (N.) confertifolia, with considerably larger leaves and flowers, scentless or slightly apple-scented, and always white. The rootstock bearing numerous self-detaching tubers. The golden water-lily, C. (N.) flava, of Florida, which long escaped the notice of botanists, is a locally abundant species of moderate dimensions, with yellow flowers. C. mystica (N. Lotus), the specific Egyptian water-lily, with white, pink, or red flowers, and C. scutifolia (N. carolin), the blue water-lily, also of Egypt, are named among the lotuses. C. (N.) thermalis is a rare species occurring in warm springs in Hungary, and called Hungarian lotus. The Australian water-lily, C. (N.) gynerioides, has the leaves in the larger specimens 18 inches broad, the flowers a foot broad with over 200 stamens, the petals blue, purple, pink or rarely white. Another general name of the water-lilies is water-nymph. See Nymphaea.

2. The pond lily, or yellow water-lily, Nymphaea (Nymphaea) lutea. See pond-lily.—3. In general, any plant of the order Nymphaeaceae, the water-lily family. See the phrases below. Blue water-lily. See del. 1. Dwarf water-lily. Same as triflor and del. 1. Egyptian water-lily. See del. 1. Fringed water-lily. See Lowenthalium. New Zealand water-lily. See Elodea. Prickly water-lily. Euryale ferox, which has the calyx and the under side of the leaves spiny. It is cultivated in India and China for its aromatic seeds. See Elodea.—Royal water-lily, the Victoria regia. See Victoria. Sweet-scented water-lily. Catalpa odorata. See del. 1. Victoria water-lily. See Victoria. White water-lily. See del. 1. Yellow water-lily. See del. 5.

water-lime (wá'tér-lîm), n. Hydraulic lime. See hydraulic. Water-lime group, in geol., a group of strata of Upper Silurian age, overlying the Onondaga Salt group, and forming the lower section of the Lower Helderberg group, according to the nomenclature of the New York Geological Survey. This class is of great importance, especially in Ulster county, New York, as furnishing a considerable part of the high calcareous manufacturing in the United States. It abounds in fossil shells to which the name Tentaculites has been given, and hence is known also as the Tentaculite group. See meant, 2, and meant-stone.

water-line (wá'tér-lîn), n. 1. The line in which water at its surface verges or borders upon anything; specifically, in ship-building, one of the horizontal lines supposed to be described by the surface of the water on the sides of a ship, and exhibited at certain depths upon the sheer-draft. The most important of these lines are the light water-line, which marks the depression of the ship's body in the water when she is light or unladen, and the load water-line, which marks her depression in the water when laden.

2. Same as water-level, 1.

The [mineral] deposits are much more valuable where they are now worked . . . than they will be below water-line.
New York Tribune, Nov. 7, 1879.

3. A semi-transparent line or mark formed in paper during its manufacture; a water-mark. See water-mark, 3.

It is supposed . . . that the waterlines are perpendicular in folio, octavo, and decimo-octavo books, and horizontal in quarto and duodecimo.

De Morgan, Arithmetical Books, xiii.

water-lined (wá'tér-lînd), a. Marked with water-lines: as, Irish linen water-lined paper.

water-liverwort (wá'tér-lîv'ér-wért), n. The water-crowfoot, Ranunculus aquatilis.

water-lizard (wá'tér-lîz'ärd), n. 1. An aquatic amphibian with four legs and a tail, as a mud-puppy, water-dog, or hellbender. See triton, newt, and cuts under hellbender, Menobranchus, axoloth, and newt. [U. S.]—2. A water-monitor or varan. See cut under Hydrosaurus.

water-lobelia (wá'tér-lô-bê'liä), n. See Lobelia, 1.

water-lock (wá'tér-lok), n. Same as lock, 1, 8.

Blount, Glossographia, 1670.

water-locust (wá'tér-lô'küst), n. A small species of honey-locust, Gleditsia monosperma, found in the southern United States, especially westward, in the bottom-lands, where it occupies large areas. The wood is of a rich dark-brown color, heavy, hard, and unsusceptible of polish. Also called stamp-locust.

water-logged (wá'tér-logd), a. [< water + logged*, of uncertain origin. In a view commonly accepted, logged, lit. 'rendered log-like,' i. e. heavy or clumsy in consequence of being filled with water; < log + -ed. In another view, logged is lit. 'laid' or 'placed,' after Sw. ratten-lagga, lay in water, soak. Other explanations have been proposed; but none accurately applies to water-logged, except by assuming some confusion of the second element. In present use the word is undoubtedly associated with log.] Saturated or filled with water: applied specifically to a ship when by leaking and receiving a great quantity of water into her hold she has become so heavy as to be nearly or altogether unmanageable, though still keeping afloat.

In the course of the summer I had discovered a raft of pitch-pine logs with the bark on. . . . Though completely waterlogged and almost as heavy as lead, they not only burned long, but made a very hot fire.

Thoreau, Walden, p. 268.

The next day the Bon Homme Richard, quite water-logged, sank, with all the wounded on board.

N. and Q., 7th ser., IV. 537.

water-lot (wá'tér-lot), n. A lot of ground which is under water; specifically, one of a regular system of city lots which are partly or wholly covered by the water of a bay, lake, or river, and may be filled in and converted into made ground for the erection of buildings, docks, etc.

Yesterday, he said, I bought a water-lot; that topsail-schooner lies at anchor there.

J. W. Palmer, The New and the Old, p. 244.

water-lotus (wá'tér-lô'tus), n. The nelumbo. See lotus, 1.

water-lung (wá'tér-lung), n. One of the respiratory trees or ramifications of the cloaca of holothurians. They are present in most of the order Holothuridae, and have an excretory or depuratory function by the continual passage of water through them.

water-lute (wá'tér-lut), n. Any form of air-tight joint formed by the agency of water: a water-seal or air-trap.

water-main (wá'tér-män), n. In water-works, any one of the principal pipes or conduits running under streets, to which the lateral service-pipes for supply of houses on either side of the street are connected.

water-maize (wá'tér-mäz), n. See maize.
waterman (wá'tér-män), n. [< pl. watermen (ment). [< water + man (= D. waterman = G. wasser-mann).] 1. A boatman; a ferryman; a man who manages water-craft; one who plies for hire on rivers, etc.

It does not become your gravity . . . to have offered this outrage on a waterman, . . . much less on a man of his civil coat.
B. Jonson, Epicene, lii. 2.

My great grandfather was but a waterman, looking one way and rowing another. Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, i.

2. One who carries or distributes water; specifically, a person who waits at a cab-stand for the purpose of supplying the horses with water, calling the cabmen when they are absent, etc. [Eng.]—Waterman's knot (naut.), a form of knot used to bend a rope about a post or bollard.

Waterman's Knot.

watermanship (wá'tér-män'ship), n. The functions, art, or skill of a waterman or oarsman; oarsmanship.

All the rowing interest of each society makes sport for itself and amusement for spectators on the banks with forms of watermanship which are lighter and more pleasant.
The Atlantic, LXVII. 792.

water-mantle (wá'tér-män'tl), n. [Tr. of G. wassermantel.] The water-jacket, or layer of water, which incloses the space in which the cultures are placed in the incubator for bacteriological investigations, and to which heat is applied, and into which is dipped the regulator that serves to keep the temperature constant. [Rare.]

Between the room . . . and the water-mantle . . . a Schloesing's membrane-regulator . . . is extended.

Huerpe, Bacteriological Investigations (trans.), p. 189.

water-maple (wá'tér-mä'pl), n. Same as red maple (which see, under maple 1).

water-marigold (wá'tér-mar'î-göld), n. An American aquatic, Bidens Beckii, of which most of the leaves are submerged and very finely dissected.

water-mark (wá'tér-märk), n. 1. The mark, line, or limit of the rise or height of water, as in a well, a river, the sea, etc.; a water-line; especially, a tide-mark.

The last tide had risen considerably above the usual water-mark.
Scott, Antiquary, vii.

2. A faintly marked letter, figure, or design in the fabric of paper, that denotes its size or its manufacturer, usually barely noticeable except when the sheet is held against strong light. It is made in the process of manufacture by the pressure of wires on the moist pulp. The water-marks used by the earlier paper-makers have given names to several of the present standard sizes of paper, as pot, foolscap, crown, elephant, and post, the last being so called from the device of a postman's horn as water-mark.

water-mark (wá'tér-märk), c. t. 1. To mark or stamp with water-lines: as, to water-mark paper; a water-marked page.—2. To mark, inscribe, or embody in water-lines.

They are without the final refinement of the recurring title water-marked in the lower margins of the page.

The Century, XXXIX. 94.

water-meadow (wá'tér-med'ô), n. A meadow capable of being kept in a state of fertility by being overflowed with water at certain seasons from some adjoining stream.

The fire-flies flitted over the water-meadows outside.
Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 690.

water-measure (wá'tér-mezh'ür), n. A unit of measure used on board ships, five pecks according to a statute of Henry VII. It was regarded as a bushel, and was similarly subdivided. A statute of 1701 declares that a water-measure is round, and 18½ inches in diameter within the hoop, and 8 inches deep, and ordains that apples and pears shall be sold by this measure heaped.

water-measurer (wá'tér-mezh'ür-ér), n. Any water-bug of the heteropterous family Hydro-metridæ.

watermelon (wá'tér-mel'on), n. A plant, Citrullus vulgaris (frequently named Cucumis Citrullus), or its fruit. The plant, supposed to be of Asiatic origin, is a slender trailing vine, requiring a warm soil. The fruit (a pepo) is of a spherical or usually elongated form, 1½ or 2 feet long, smooth and green, or sometimes variegated on the outside, containing within a rose-colored or sometimes yellowish pulp, pleasantly flavored, and abounding in a refreshing sweetish watery juice. The watermelon is largely cultivated in Egypt, India, China, Japan, America, southern France, and elsewhere.

Their Watermelons were much more large, and of several kinds, distinguished by the color of their meat and seed. . . . They are excellently good, and very pleasant to the taste, as also to the eye; having the rind of a lively green color, streaked and watered, the meat of a carnation, and the seed black and shining while it lies in the melon.
Beverley, Hist. Virginia, iv. ¶ 19.

water-meter (wá'tér-mê'tér), n. 1. An instrument that measures the quantity of water that passes through it, as a gas-meter measures gas. There are various contrivances for this purpose. See cuts on following page.—2. An instrument for determining the amount Water-meters.

A. a, case; b, inlet and outlet; c, hand rubber rotating piston; d, rotating spindle which drives the registering mechanism e, by means of a connection (not shown); f, dial.

B. a, a', case, composed of two cylinders cast integrally; b, one of the two plungers; c, valve actuated by b, controlling the flow into and out of the cylinder a. A similar valve in a' controls the flow into and out of a', and in this way the plunger in each cylinder governs the flow into and out of the other. The plungers are hollow, and have very nearly the specific gravity of water. Their reciprocations, through a connection (not shown), drive the registering mechanism d. The inlet (not shown) is opposite the outlet e.

water-milfoil (wá'tér-mil'fóil), n. See milfoil.

water-mill (wá'tér-mil), n. A mill whose machinery is driven by water.

There are in this City 200. Schooles, 200. Innes, 400. water-miles, 600. water-Conduits, 700. Temples and Oratories.

Capit. John Smith, Works, I. 47.

water-mint (wá'tér-mint), n. The bergamot-mint, Mentha aquatica, an herb of wet places in Europe and Asiatic Russia, naturalized in other localities, growing sparingly in the eastern United States. It affords a perfumers' oil. The water-mint or brook-mint of early usage was M. sylvestris. See mint 2.

Those which perfume the air most delightfully, not passed by as the rest, but being trodden upon and crushed, are three—that is, burnet, wild thyme, and water-mints. Bacon, Gardens (ed. 1887), p. 444.

water-mite (wá'tér-mít), n. Any mite of the family Hydrachnidae; a water-tick. See Hydrachna, and ent under Hydrachna. Also called water-spider.

water-moccasin (wá'tér-mok'a-sin), n. A water-adder; a name applied with little discrimination in the United States to several species of aquatic snakes; properly, the venomous Therophis or Aneides piscivorus, with the harmless Tropidonotus (or Nerodia) sipedon is sometimes confounded. See water-snake, and ent under moccasin.

water-mole (wá'tér-mól), n. 1. A desman; a member of the genus Myogale. See ent under desman.—2. The duck-mole, or duck-billed platypus, Ornithorhynchus paradoxus. See ent under duckbill.

water-monitor (wá'tér-mon'tor), n. A large water-lizard of the family Monitoridae or Varanidae; any aquatic monitor, or varan. One of the best-known is the Indian kubarogaya, or two-handed monitor, Monitor or Varanus salvator, attaining a length of 5 or 6 feet. See ent under Hydrosaurus.

water-monkey (wá'tér-mung'ki), n. A globular vessel with a straight upright neck, commonly of earthenware, used in tropical countries for holding water.

water-moss (wá'tér-mós), n. A moss of the genus Fountainia (which see).

water-moth (wá'tér-móth), n. A caddis-fly; so called from its aquatic habits and resemblance to a moth. See ent under caddis-worm.

Every good disciple of Walton and lover of the "gentle art" knows the value of the caddis-fly or water-moth as bait.

Riley, 5th Mo. Ent. Rep., p. 16.

water-motor (wá'tér-mō'tor), n. Any water-wheel or turbine; in a narrower and the more common sense, any form of small motor using water under pressure, and serving to drive light machinery, such as printing-presses and sewing-machines. Such motors are made in the form of overshot wheels inclosed in a casing, reciprocating pistons in cylinders, and rotary engines. Another form is a small turbine designed to be fitted to a common house supply-pipe. Small engines with oscillating cylinders are also a, case supported on legs; b, gate-valve for regulating flow; c, buckets or floats attached to the outer margin of a disk keyed to the shaft of the hand-wheel f. The buckets c play in an annular enlargement e of the case as they receive the impact of the stream flowing through b. The water is discharged at d.

used. Another form, employing the pressure of a large body of water to raise a smaller quantity, is called a water-pressure pump, but is essentially a water-motor used as a pump.

water-mouse (wá'tér-mous), n. An Australian murine rodent of the genus Hydromys and subfamily Hydromyinae. See ent under beaver-rat.—White-bellied water-mouse. See white-bellied.—Yellow-bellied water-mouse. See yellow-bellied.

water-murrian (wá'tér-mur'ian), n. A disease among cattle.

water-net (wá'tér-net), n. See Hydrodictyon.

water-newt (wá'tér-nūt), n. An aquatic newt; a triton. See ent under newt and axolotl.

water-nixy (wá'tér-nik'si), n. [After G. was-ser-nix; < water + nix.] A water-spirit; an elf inhabiting the water.

The shallowness of a water-nixy's soul may have a charm until she becomes diabolic.

George Eliot, Middlemarch, lxi.

water-nut (wá'tér-nut), n. The large edible seed of plants of the genus Trapa, or the plant itself; also called Singhara nut. See ent under Trapa.

water-nymph (wá'tér-nimf), n. 1. A Naiad.—2. A plant of the genus Najas.—3. The water-lily, Catalpa (Nymphaea).

water-oak (wá'tér-ók), n. 1. In bot., an oak, Quercus aquatica, of the southern United States, most common and best developed along streams in the eastern Gulf States. Its wood is heavy, hard, and coarse-grained, and does not appear to be used except for fuel. Also duck-, possum-, or punk-oak.—2. Same as pin-oak.

water-oats (wá'tér-ōts), n. pl. See Indian rice (a), under rice.

water-opossum (wá'tér-ō-pos'um), n. The South American yapok. See ent under yapok.

water-ordeal (wá'tér-ōr'ōl), n. See ordeal, 1.

water-organ (wá'tér-ōr'gan), n. See hydraulic organ, under organ.

water-ouzel (wá'tér-ō'zəl), n. See ouzel.

water-oven (wá'tér-uv'n), n. In chem., an oven surrounded on all sides but the front or top with a chamber of boiling water or steam, used for drying chemical preparations, etc.

water-ox (wá'tér-oks), n. pl. water-oren (-oks'n). The water-cow.

Water-oxen turned up their noses at us.

Littell's Living Age, CLXI, 88.

water-padda (wá'tér-pad'ā), n. A South African toad, Breviceps gibbosus.

water-pang (wá'tér-pang), n. Pyrosis.

water-parsley (wá'tér-pārs'li), n. 1. One of several water-loving umbelliferous plants. [Eng.]—2. See Richardsonia.

water-parsnip (wá'tér-pārs'nip), n. A plant of the genus Sium, especially S. latifolium. See ent under skirret.

water-parting (wá'tér-pār'ting), n. Same as watershed.

The high land which forms the divisional line between two contiguous river-basins is called the water-parting. Instead of water-parting some writers employ the term watershed.

Huxley, Physiography, p. 18.

water-partridge (wá'tér-pār'trij), n. The ruddy duck, Erismatura rubida. G. Trumbull, 1888. See ent under Erismatura. [Patuxent river, Maryland.]

water-passage (wá'tér-pas'āj), n. A passage for water; specifically, the urethra.

water-pennywort (wá'tér-pen'f-wért), n. Same as marsh-pennywort.

water-pepper (wá'tér-pep'ér), n. 1. The smart-weed, Polygonum Hydropiper. The mild water-pepper is P. hydropiperoides.—2. Same as waterwort, 1.

water-persicaria (wá'tér-pér-si-kā ri-ā), n. See persicaria.

water-pewit (wá'tér-pé wit), n. See pewit (c) and Sayornis.

water-pheasant (wá'tér-fez ant), n. 1. The Chinese jaccana, Hydrophasianus chirurgus. See ent under Hydrophasianus.—2. The pintail or a congeneric duck, having a long tail. See pheasant (d) (5), and ent under Dafila.—3. The goosander, Mergus merganser; also, the hooded merganser, Lophodytes cucullatus.

waterphone (wá'tér-fōn), n. [Irreg. < water + Gr. phōn, voice, sound, simulating telephone.] An instrument for observing the flow of water in pipes and the detection of leaks, when the pipes are laid underground or in other inaccessible places. A common form consists of a metallic diaphragm arranged in an ear trumpet after a manner analogous to a telephone receiver, and having a slender rod of steel connected with the diaphragm in such a way as not to touch the trumpet. In use the free end of the rod is placed upon the pipe to be examined, and the ear, placed at the trumpet, is thus enabled to hear distinctly sounds that, without this device, would be entirely inaudible.

water-piet (wá'tér-pī'et), n. The water-ouzel or dipper, Cinclus aquaticus. Also water-pyjet. See ent under dipper. Montagu. [Prov. Eng.]

water-pig (wá'tér-pig), n. 1. A porpoise.—2. The capibara (which see, with ent).—3. A fish, the gourami.

water-pillar (wá'tér-pil'ār), n. 1. A water-spout.—2. On a railroad, an upright pipe with a swinging hollow arm or gooseneck, placed beside the track for supplying water to locomotives; a water-crane.

water-pimpernel (wá'tér-pim pēr-nel), n. See pimpernel.

water-pine (wá'tér-pān), n. See pine, 1.

water-pipe (wá'tér-pīp), n. [ME. water-pipe; < water + pipe.] 1. A pipe for conveying water. Wright, Vocabulary.

Single I grew, like some green plant, whose root Creeps to the garden water-pipes beneath, Feeding the flower. Tennyson, Fair Women.

2. A waterspout. [Archaic.]

One deep calleth another, because of the noise of the water-pipes. Book of Common Prayer, Psalter, Ps. xlii, 9.

water-pipit (wá'tér-pip it), n. One of several species of Anthus which are common in various parts of Europe, especially that usually called A. aquaticus, also A. spinoletta, and more correctly A. spioletta. See Anthus and pipit.

waterpitt, n. [ME. waterput; < AS. waterpūt; as water + pūt.] A pit of water. Trevisa, III, 401.

water-pitcher (wá'tér-pich'ér), n. 1. A pitcher for holding water.—2. A plant of the order Sarraceniales, including the common pitcher-plant or sidesaddle-flower. See ent under pitcher-plant.

water-plane (wá'tér-plān), n. In ship-building, a plane passing through a vessel when afloat, on a level with the surface of the water. When the vessel has her stores and equipments only on board, such a plane is a light water-plane; when she is loaded, it is a load water-plane. Compare water-line.

water-plant (wá'tér-plant), n. A plant which grows in water; an aquatic plant.

water-plantain (wá'tér-plan'tān), n. A plant of the genus Alisma, chiefly A. Plantago, the common or great water-plantain, growing in shallow water throughout the temperate northern hemisphere, reappearing in Australia. Its leaves in form and arrangement suggest those of the common plantain, but are not ridged; the flowers are small and white-petaled, borne in an open panicle a foot or two long. A smaller species is A. ranunculoides; a floating species, A. natans; both are European.

water-plate (wá'tér-plāt), n. A plate having a double bottom or a lining of different material, with a space left in which hot water can be put, to keep articles of food warm.

This kind of dish (sentiment), above all, requires to be served up hot or sent off in water-plate, that your friend may have it almost as warm as yourself.

Lamb, Distant Correspondents.

water-platter (wá'tér-plat'ér), n. The royal water-lily, Victoria regia; so named with reference to its broad floating leaves with upturned margin.

water-plow (wá'tér-plōn), n. A machine formerly used for taking mud, etc., out of rivers. Halliwel.

water-poise (wá'tér-pōiz), n. A hydrometer, or instrument for ascertaining the specific gravity of different liquids.

water-pore (wá'tér-pōr), n. 1. In zool., the pore or orifice by which a water-tube of any water-vascular system opens to the exterior.—2. In bot., an aperture or pore in the epidermis of certain plants, through which water is frequently expressed. It resembles an ordinary stoma, but has no guard-cells, and is situated directly over the extremities of the fibers of the framework. These apertures are of various size and form.

water-post (wá'tér-póst), n. A post (often a lamp-post) to which a pressure-gage is affixed, the gage being connected with the main and supply branches of a water-pipe, and serving to indicate the water-pressure in some part of a system of water-supply.

water-pot (wá'tér-pót), n. [< ME. water-pot, water-pott, water-pot; < water + pot.] 1. Any pot or vessel for holding, conveying, or distributing water.

Then for the woman left the water-pot and went into the city. Wyclif, John iv. 28.

2. Same as watering-pot, 1.

To use his eyes for garden water-pots,
Ay, and laying autumn's dust.

Shaks., Lear, iv. 6. 200.

3. A chamber-pot.

water-pouke, n. [< water + pouke, a pimple or blister, a little pouch or poke holding water; cf. poke², pouch.] Same as vesicle, 1 (b).

water-power (wá'tér-pou-ér), n. The power of water employed, or capable of being employed, as a prime mover in machinery; hence, a fall or descent in a stream capable of being utilized for mechanical purposes.

The water-power to which a riparian owner is entitled consists of the fall in the stream when in its natural state, as it passes through his land, or along the boundaries of it. Or, in other words, it consists of the difference of level between the surface where the stream first touches his land and the surface where it leaves it.

Gibson, C. J., 3 Rawle (Penn.), p. 90.

Absorbent-strata water-power. See absorbent.

water-pox (wá'tér-poks), n. Variella or chicken-pox.

water-press (wá'tér-pres), n. Same as hydrostatic or hydraulic press. See hydraulic, E. H. Knight.

water-prism (wá'tér-prizm), n. In a canal or river, the body of water at any part of its course as determined by the cross-section at that part, regarded as a cross-section of a prism.

The Yazoo river, by measurements, returned 129,000 cubic feet per second at the date of highest water at Vicksburg (June 27) to the water-prism.

Gov. Report on Mississippi River, 1861 (rep. 1876), p. 80.

water-privilege (wá'tér-priv'i-lee), n. 1. The right to use water; especially, the right to use running water to turn machinery. See water-power.—2. A stream or body of water capable of being utilized in driving machinery. [U. S.] waterproof (wá'tér-pröf), a. and n. [< water + proof, a.] 1. a. Impervious to water, or nearly so.—Waterproof glue. See glue.

II. n. 1. Any material which repels water; especially, a light woolen cloth made for the purpose, and subjected to some waterproofing application.—2. A garment of some material that repels water, made either of waterproof (1), or of mackintosh or a similar material made with india-rubber.

"There is going to be rain, Sheila," her father said, smelling the moisture in the keen air. "Will you hief your waterproof?" W. Black, Princess of Thule, xxvi.

Just as we reached it the mist turned to heavy rain. This is the depressing side of sight-seeing in Scotland; you must take your holidays in waterproofs.

Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 345.

waterproof (wá'tér-pröf), v. t. [< waterproof, a.] To render impervious to water, as cloth, leather, etc.

Thirty yards of waterproofed and polished fly-line of braided silk. The Century, XXVI. 378.

waterproofer (wá'tér-prö-fer), n. One who renders materials waterproof.

Waterproofers and lamp black makers.

Lancet, 1890, I. 429.

waterproofing (wá'tér-prö-fing), n. [Verbal n. of waterproof, v.] 1. The process or method of rendering impervious to water, as clothing, boots and shoes, and fishing-lines.

The final combination of dubbing, whitening, waterproofing, etc., it is claimed, gives the leather a superior finish. C. T. Davis, Leather, p. 305.

2. The material with which a substance is made waterproof, as caoutchouc, a varnish, or an oil.

As umbrellas were not used by men, as being too effeminate, and india rubber waterproofing was only to be discovered more than a century later, men in Anne's reign had to put their trust in good broad cloth cloaks.

J. Ashton, Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, I. 150.

water-propeller (wá'tér-pro-pel-ér), n. A rotary pump. E. H. Knight.

water-pump (wá'tér-pump), n. A pump for water: used humorously of the eyes.

"Thank you, Dobbin," he said, rubbing his eyes with his knuckles. . . . The water-pumps were at work again, and I am not sure that the soft-hearted Captain's eyes did not also twinkle. Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xxiv.

water-puppy (wá'tér-pup'i), n. Same as water-dog, 2.

water-purpie (wá'tér-pér'pi), n. [< water + purpie, a Sc. corruption of purple.] A species of Veronica, V. Beccabunga, found in moist places; brook-lime. [Scotch.] Cresses or water-purpie, and a bit ait-cake, can serve the Master for breakfast as well as Calch.

Scott, Bride of Lammermoor, xviii.

water-purslane (wá'tér-pérs'lan), n. See purslane.

water-pyret, n. See water-piet.

water-quaker (wá'tér-kwák), n. A violent disturbance of water. [Rare.]

Wattlesmere . . . sometimes in Calmes and faire weather sodainly rise tempestuously, as it were, into violent water-quakes, to the danger of the poore fishermen.

Holland, tr. of Camden, p. 500. (Davies.)

water-qualm (wá'tér-kwám), n. Pyrosis.

water-quenched (wá'tér-kweneht), a. Cooled by immersion in water: a term frequently used in speaking of tempering steel and similar operations.

water-quintain (wá'tér-kwín'tân), n. The sport of tilting at the quintain by a person standing in a boat, which was rowed rapidly past. If the tilter was not sufficiently alert, the return of the quintain threw him into the water.

water-rabbit (wá'tér-rab'it), n. The swamp-hare of the lower Mississippi valley, Lepus aquaticus. See cut under swamp-hare.

water-radish (wá'tér-rad'ish), n. A tall water-cress, Nasturtium amphibium, of wet places in the northern Old World. Other species of Nasturtium are also so named. Also radish.

water-rail (wá'tér-räl), n. 1. The common rail of Europe, Rallus aquaticus, as distinguished from land-rail, Crex pratensis: any species of Rallus.—2. The European gallinule, Gallinula chloropus, the water-hen or moor-hen. [Local, Eng.] water-ram (wá'tér-rum), n. A machine for raising water: same as hydraulic ram (which see, under hydraulic).

water-ranny (wá'tér-ran'i), n. 1. The short-tailed field-mouse. Halliwel.—2. Properly, the water-shrew.

water-rat (wá'tér-rat), n. One of several different rodents, of aquatic habits, belonging to the family Muridae. (a) In Europe, the water-vole, a comparatively large blackish species, Arvicola amphibius.

Water-rat (Arvicola amphibius).

bins, which lives in the banks of streams or lakes. See vole². (b) In America, the musquash or muskrat, Fiber zibethicus. See cut under muskrat. (c) In Australia and Tasmania, a water-mouse; any species of the genus Hydrornis, as H. chrysogaster or H. leucogaster: also called beaver rat. See cut under beaver-rat.

water-rate (wá'tér-rät), n. A rate or tax for the supply of water. Also water-rent.

water-rattler (wá'tér-rät'ler), n. The diamond rattlesnake, Crotalus adamanteus, often found in moist places. Also water-rattle. [Local, U. S.] water-reed (wá'tér-réd), n. A grass of the genus Arundo.

water-rent (wá'tér-rent), n. Same as water-rate.

water-ret (wá'tér-ret), v. t. Same as water-rot.

water-retting (wá'tér-ret'ing), n. See retting, 1. Encyc. Brit., IX. 294.

water-rice (wá'tér-ris), n. The Indian rice, Zizania aquatica. See rice, and cut under Zizania.

water-robin (wá'tér-robin), n. An Asiatic flycatcher, Acanthopogon fidiginosa. See robin, 3, and cut under Acanthopogon.

water-rocket (wá'tér-rok-ét), n. 1. A plant of the genus Nasturtium; water-cress.—2. A kind of firework designed to be discharged in the water.

water-room (wá'tér-röm), n. The space in a steam-boiler occupied by water, as distinct from the steam-room, or the space which contains steam.

water-rose (wá'tér-röz), n. The water-lily.

water-rot (wá'tér-rot), v. t. To cause to rot by steeping in water, as in some of the mechanical trades. Also water-rot.

water-route (wá'tér-röt), n. A stream or other tract of water used as a route of travel.

The competition of parallel railroad lines or water-routes. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 586.

water-rug (wá'tér-rng), n. [< water + rug], equiv. here to shock³, shough.] A kind of dog.

Hounds and greyhounds, mongrels, spaniels, curs, Shoughs, water-rugs, and demi-wolves are clept water-sail (wá'tér-säl), n. A small sail occasionally set under a lower studdingsail.
All by the name of dogs. Shaks., Macbeth, iii. 1. 94.

water-salamander (wá'tér-sal'g-man-dér), n. A water-newt.

water-sallow (wá'tér-sal'ö), n. [< water + salow².] Same as water-willow, 1.

water-sapphire (wá'tér-saf'ir), n. A precious stone of an intense blue color and transparent, found in small rolled masses in Ceylon. It is a variety of iolite.

waterscape (wá'tér-skäp), n. [< water + -scape, as in landscape.] A water- or sea-view as distinguished from a landscape; a seascape. [Rare.] water-scorpion (wá'tér-skör'pi-on), n. A large aquatic and carnivorous bug of the family Nepidae. See Nepa.

water-screw (wá'tér-skrö), n. A water-elevator consisting of an application of the Archimedean screw. It has spiral vanes set on an inclined axis revolving within a cylindrical casing whose lower end is in the water.

water-seal (wá'tér-sēl), n. A body of water interposed as a bar to the passage or escape of gas. A common way of forming a water-seal is to insert the open mouth of a pipe or vessel designed to hold the gas below the surface of water in another vessel to a depth at which the hydraulic pressure opposing the escape of the gas is equal to or greater than the pneumatic pressure of the gas. Another method is to form a bend downward in a pipe, and fill the bent part with water. Compare trap, 4.

water-serpent (wá'tér-sēr'pēnt), n. Same as sea-serpent, 2.

watershed (wá'tér-shed), n. [< water + shed]. The edge of a river-basin (see river); the line separating the waters flowing into two different rivers or river-basins. Thus, the crest of the Sierra Nevada of California forms the watershed between the rivers flowing into the Pacific and those which lose themselves in the Great Basin. Sometimes called the water-parting, and in the United States more frequently and popularly the divide. Thus, the "Continental Divide" is the line which marks the separation of the waters flowing into the Pacific from those finding their way to the Gulf of Mexico.

Midnight! the outpost of advancing day! . . .
The watershed of Time, from which the streams
Of Yesterday and To-morrow take their way!

Longfellow, The Two Rivers, I.

The summit of the pass is called the divide or water-shed. In this last word the "shed" has not the present meaning, but an obsolescent one of "part" or "divide" (Ger. Scheiden). Skat says: "The old sense 'to part' is nearly obsolete, except in water-shed, the ridge which parts river-systems." . . . The water-shed of any river basin limits its "area of catchment," as the hydraulic engineers call it. J. D. Whitney, Names and Places, p. 141.

water-sheep (wá'tér-shēp), n. The roach, a fish: so called in antithesis to water-for (the carp). See cut under roach, 1. Walton.

water-shell (wá'tér-shel), n. In ornithology, a shell, invented by M. Abel, consisting of an ordinary shell with a centrally placed cylinder of gun-cotton, having the space between this cylinder and the walls of the shell filled with water. The shell is hermetically sealed to retain the water.

water-shield (wá'tér-shēld), n. A plant of either of the genera Cubomba and Brasenia, which form the suborder Cubombæ, of the Nymphetæ: so called as consisting of aquatics with peltate leaves. Brasenia peltata, with floating oval leaves 1 to 4 inches across and small dull-purple flowers, is found in North America, Asia, Africa, and Australia. Also water-buckler.

water-shoot (wá'tér-shöt), n. [< water + shoot, prob. confused also with chute.] 1. A pipe or trough for discharging water from a building.—2. A shoot from the root of a tree.

water-shrew (wá'tér-shrö), n. An oar-footed aquatic shrew. In Europe the best-known species is Crotophaga foliata. The corresponding American species is Neosorex palustris. See second cut under shrew.

water-shut (wá'tér-shut), n. That which stops the passage of water.

Who all the morn
Had from the quarry with his pick-axe torne
A large well-squared stone, which he would cut
To serve his stile, or for some water-shut.
W. Browne, Britannia's Pastors. (Nares.)

waterside (wá'tér-síd), n. The brink of water; the bank or margin of a river, stream, or lake; the sea-shore; sometimes used attributively.

Come, Master Belch, I will bring you to the water side, perhaps to Wapping, and there I'll leave you.
Dicker and Webster, Northward Ho, ii. 1.

Water side insects are well described, particularly the ephemeroidea.
The Academy, April 25, 1891, p. 302.

water-silvering (wá'tér-sil'vēr-ing), n. A process of silvering analogous to water-gilding.

water-sink (wá'tér-sínk), n. See put-hole.

water-skin (wá'tér-skin), n. A vessel or bag of skin used for the storage or transportation of water.

We had water, it is true, from the Nile; but we never thought we could have too much, as long as there was room in our water-skins to hold more.

Brue, Source of the Nile, I. 177.

water-skipper (wá'tér-skip'pér), n. One of the slender long-legged water-bugs of the genus Hygrotrechus; any water-strider.

water-sky (wá'tér-ski), n. A peculiar reflection in the sky, common in arctic regions, indicating the presence of open water beneath.

Some circumstances which he reports seem to point to the existence of a north water all the year round; and the frequent water-skies, fogs, &c., that we have seen to the southwest during the winter go to confirm the fact.

Kane, See. Grinnell Exp., I. 236.

water-slater (wá'tér-slát'tér), n. Any aquatic isopod or slater of the genus Asellus.

water-smartweed (wá'tér-smárt'wéd), n. See smartweed.

water-smoke (wá'tér-smök), n. Water evaporating in the visible form of fog or mist; a phenomenon that occurs when the temperature of water-surfaces is above the dew-point of the air, and the air is already saturated with moisture. Water-smoke is frequently observed over rivers or other bodies of water after a sudden fall of temperature, when, in popular language, it is said "the river steams," and in damp weather over water-covered surfaces which are much warmer than the air, and is also seen frequently in arctic regions.

We had not been able to get the dogs out when the big moon appeared above the water-smoke.

Kane, See. Grinnell Exp., II. 32.

water-snail (wá'tér-snál), n. 1. An aquatic pulmonate gastropod; a pond-snail, as a limneid, or one of many similar snails. See cuts under Limnaea and Limnæidæ.—2. The Archimedean screw. [Rare.]

water-snake (wá'tér-snák), n. A snake which frequents the water; variously applied.

In the Friendly Islands the water-snake was much respected.

Sir J. Lubbock, Orig. of Civilisation, p. 179.

Especially—(a) Any one of the venomous sea-snakes. See Hydrophidæ and sea-serpent, 2, with cuts there or there cited. (b) The Indian Hydrophis unicolor, or any member of the family Homalodidae. (c) A wart-snake; any member of the Acerchordidae, as species of Acerchordus and Chersidrus. See cut under wart-snake. (d) The common ringed snake of Europe, Tropidonotus natrix. See cuts under snake and Tropidonotus. (e) In the United States, one of several harmless aquatic colubrids, as the species of Nerodia (or Tropidonotus) and Regina, as N. sipedon and R. uberris. In the West several species of water-snakes (Eubentia) are thoroughly aquatic, and would come locally under this name. See water-adder and water-moccasin.

water-soak (wá'tér-sök), v. t. To soak or fill the interstices of with water.

water-socks (wá'tér-söks), n. pl. The white water-lily, Castalia speciosa. Britten and Holland.

water-sodden (wá'tér-sod'den), a. [water + sodden, pp. of sothe.] Soaked and softened in water; water-soaked. Tennyson.

water-soldier (wá'tér-sól'djér), n. The water-sagegreen, Stratiotes aloides. Also called water-elm.

water-sorrel (wá'tér-sor'el), n. Same as water-dock.

water-souchy (wá'tér-sou'chi), n. Fish boiled and served in its own liquor. See zouch, v. t.

water-space (wá'tér-spās), n. That part of a steam-boiler which lies below the steam-space, and is designed to hold the water to be evaporated.

water-spaniel (wá'tér-span'yel), n. The name given to two varieties of the dog called spaniel, namely, the large water-spaniel and the small water-spaniel. See spaniel, 1.

water-sparrow (wá'tér-spar'ō), n. 1. The reed-bunting or reed-sparrow, Emberiza schenckii. [Prov. Eng.]—2. A reed- or sedge-warbler of the genus Acrocephalus, as A. streperus or A. phragmitis. [Prov. Eng.]

water-speedwell (wá'tér-spēd'wel), n. See speedwell.

water-spider (wá'tér-spi'dér), n. 1. A spider of the family Drassidae, Argyrota aquatica, which makes a bag of silk on water-plants, and lives in it under water as in a diving-bell, the opening being below, so that the air cannot escape. It is filled by the spider, which brings down bubbles of air one at a time. See diving-spider, and cut under Argyrota.—2. Any one of certain spiders of the lycosid genus Dolomedes, as D. tenebrosus, D. urinator, or D. scirpunculus, which build nests of leaves and twigs on overhanging rushes, just at the surface of the water in shallow streams; a raft-spider. The spiders construct their cocoons and live in these nests. They run rapidly over and dive beneath the surface of the water, where they can remain for some time.

3. A water-mite or water-tick.—4. A bug of the genus Hydrometra; a water-measurer. Encyc. Diet.

water-spike (wá'tér-spiik), n. A plant of the genus Potamogeton, which consists of aquatics with small greenish or reddish flowers in spikes or heads; pondweed.

water-spinner (wá'tér-spin'ér), n. A water-spider; especially, the diving spider.

waterspout (wá'tér-spout), n. 1. A pipe, nozzle, or orifice from which water is spouted.

The manner in which he gazed at the shops, stumbled into the gutters, ran against the porters, and stood under the waterspouts, marked him out as an excellent subject for the operations of swindlers and banterers.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., iii.

Every dozen or fifteen miles is a station—two or three sheds, and a water-spout and woodpile.

S. Bowles, Our New West, p. 50.

2. A spout, jet, or column of water; specifically, a whirlwind over a body of water, producing the appearance of a solid column of water extending from the surface to the clouds. In reality, however, the phenomenon that is seen is the cloud brought down to the earth's surface by the rapid gyratory motion of a vertical whirl, and it consists simply of fine mist surrounding a central axis of rarefaction. At first the cloud has the form of a tapering funnel; then, descending to near the water's surface, it draws up the water for a distance into its vortex, and imparts to it its whirling motion. The spout is then complete, and appears as an immense column connecting sea and cloud, light in color near the center, but dark along the sides. Like other whirlwinds, the waterspout has a progressive as well as a rotary motion, its axis sometimes being inclined forward in the direction of advance. After continuing a short time, generally less than twenty minutes, the column is dissipated, the lower part descending as rain, while the upper part is drawn back into the clouds. The height of the spout depends upon the hygrometric state of the air; in general it is between 800 and 2,500 feet. It is common for a number of waterspouts to be seen simultaneously or successively; and this is to be expected, for a series of separate and independent gyrations are likely to arise when the air is in a state of instability, such as is required for the development of these whirlwinds. This is especially the case in tropical and equatorial regions, where waterspouts are most frequent.

Deep calleth unto deep at the noise of thy waterspouts.

Ps. xlii. 7.

water-sprite (wá'tér-sprít), n. A sprite or spirit inhabiting the water.

A speck, a mist, a shape, I wist!
And still it heard'd and near'd!
As if it doted a water-sprite,
It plunged and tacked and veer'd.

Coleridge, Ancient Mariner, iii.

water-stairs (wá'tér-stärz), n. pl. Stairs leading down to water, as on the banks of the Thames, where boats are taken for ferriage, etc.

He has but a tender weak body, but was always very temperate;—made him damnable drunk at Somerset-house, where, at the water-stairs, he fell down, and had a cruel fall.

Aubrey, Lives (Edmund Waller).

water-standing (wá'tér-stan'ding), n. Wet with water; perpetually filled with tears.

[Rare.]

An orphan's water-standing eye.

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., v. 6. 40.

water-star (wá'tér-stär), n. Same as star-fruit.

water-stargrass (wá'tér-stär gräs), n. An aquatic herb, Heteranthera (Scheuchera) graminea, with grass-like leaves and yellow starry flowers.

water-starwort (wá'tér-stär'wört), n. See Calitriche and star-grass.

waterstead† (wá'tér-sted), n. The bed of a river. Admiral Smyth.

water-stream (wá'tér-strēm), n. [ME. water-stræm, < AS. water-stræm; as water + stream.] A stream of water; a river.

For all all saw se water-stream . . . fleteth forth . . . toward to se.

Ormrod (ed. White), I. 1892.

water-strider (wá'tér-strī'dér), n. Any aquatic heteropterous insect of the family Hydro- batidae; a water-skipper; so called from their long, slender, straddling legs and aquatic habits.

The water striders prefer quiet waters, upon which they rest, or over which they skim rapidly.

Cowstock, Introduct. Entom. (1888), p. 193.

water-supply (wá'tér-su-pli), n. The obtaining of water for and its distribution to a town or city, as far as possible in sufficient quantity and of satisfactory quality; also, the amount of water thus provided and distributed. Water-supply, as this term is generally used, differs from irrigation in that the latter has to do with providing and distributing water for agricultural purposes—that is, it is an attempt to make up for a deficiency of, or for irregularity in, the natural rainfall. Water-supply, on the other hand, is the providing of water for domestic and manufacturing uses in sufficient quantity, and under favorable conditions, not only as to purity, but also as to pressure, so that it may be available without the necessity of carrying it by hand to the upper stories of houses or manufactories, and as to storage, so that large quantities can be used within a short period of time, as when needed for extinguishing extensive conflagrations in cities. The question of water-supply is one which has to do, and to a most important extent, with the health, comfort, and material well-being of all localities, even where there is only a moderately dense aggregation of population; and the larger and denser such aggregation the more important this question becomes. The natural source of water-supply is the rain, and this is one of great importance in regions of considerable rainfall and of thinly aggregated population, the water being caught on the roofs of the houses or barns and conveyed to cisterns where it is stored for use as wanted, and from which it has to be pumped. Almost everywhere in regions of considerable precipitation water can be had by digging shallow wells in the surface detritus, and this is an extremely common mode of supply in agricultural districts, the advantage being that the expense of digging a well is much less than that of providing storage in cisterns, while the disadvantage is that well-water is ordinarily not so pure as rain-water (and this is emphatically the case in limestone districts). Besides, it is almost impossible to provide cisterns large enough to hold the amount of rain-water required during periods of abnormally long drought, such as occasionally occur even in regions of considerable average rainfall. These sources of supply—namely, rain caught as it falls and water from shallow wells—are entirely unsuited to the conditions in towns of even moderate size. The rainfall in cities is contaminated with soot and gases thrown out from the chimneys of houses and manufacturing establishments; neither is it large enough in quantity, nor can it be stored satisfactorily without incurring an expense far greater than would be that of providing a supply in some other way. Rivers would seem to be the natural source of supply for cities situated upon them, and there are few very large cities through which a river does not run; but rivers are the natural and almost necessary sewers of the cities drained by them, and the water, thus polluted, is not only often disagreeable to the taste, but is always a possible source of danger to health. It is true that some cities of moderate size situated on very large rivers do use their water, as, for instance, St. Louis on the Mississippi; but, in general, if a river is used, the water must be taken from a point high enough up-stream to avoid the risk of contamination from the sewage of the towns situated on or near its banks, as is done in London, which is largely supplied by water from the Thames drawn from a point far above the city. The most satisfactory source of water-supply for a city is a mountain-lake, not too far distant, where the geological and other conditions are such as to insure a high degree of purity in the water. This is emphatically the case with regard to Glasgow, which is supplied from Loch Katrine. Much oftener water satisfactory in quality and abundant in quantity can be obtained by creating one or more artificial lakes at the head of a suitably situated river by the construction of dams; these are sometimes of great height, holding back bodies of water miles in length. Of this character is the water-supply of Liverpool, of New York, of Boston, and of many other important cities. Regions underlain by thick masses of permeable rocks—as, for instance, the New Red Sandstone and Chalk districts of England—are not infrequently supplied with water by means of wells bored to considerable depths and of large dimensions, from which the water sometimes rises to the surface, but more often has to be pumped. Many large towns in the manufacturing districts of England were formerly almost exclusively, and are still to some extent, supplied in this way; but wherever it has been found possible to obtain water in some better way this system has been abandoned, neither quality nor quantity being satisfactory. Considerable water is procured in England from deep wells in the chalk, and this method of supply is of some importance in London. Where the conditions are such that pure water cannot be had, artificial purification is sometimes resorted to, but this is always expensive and often unsatisfactory. An abundant supply of soft water, taken from some source known to be free from the possibility of contamination by sewage or otherwise, is one of the greatest of blessings, and this result has been attained in various cities, but not without large expenditure and no small amount of engineering skill. The distribution of water was once a matter of considerable difficulty, the wooden pipes first employed being subject to rot and leakage. In modern times the use of cast-iron for the mains is most common, while the service-pipes are usually of lead, but sometimes of bronze or brass.

water-swallow† (wá'tér-swol'ō), n. The water-wagtail. Halliwel.

water-system (wá'tér-sis tem), n. In zool., the water-vascular system.

water-tabby (wá'tér-tab i), n. Tabby having a watered surface.

water-table (wá'tér-tā bl), n. 1. In arch., a string-course, molding, or other projecting member so placed as to throw off water from the wall of a building.

It should not be forgotten that a noble foundation there was for the chapel, which did runne from the Colledge along the street as far as the Blew Boare Inn; which was about 7 foot or more high, and adorned with a very rich Gothique water-table.

Autrey, Lives (Thomas Wolsey).

2. A small embankment made across a road, especially on a hill, to carry off the water. Hallidell. [Prov. Eng.]—3. Same as water-bridge.

water-tank (wá'tér-tangk), n. A tank, cistern, or other receiver for holding water.

The sensitizing bath, plate-holders, water-tanks, etc., all adjusted. Silver Sunbeam, p. 128.

water-tap (wá'tér-tap), n. A tap or cock by which water may be drawn from any supply.

water-target (wá'tér-tárgét), n. The water-shield, Brasenia peltata.

water-tath (wá'tér-tath), n. A species of coarse grass growing in wet grounds, and supposed to be injurious to sheep. [Prov. Eng.]

water-telescope (wá'tér-tel'e-skóp), n. See telescope.

water-thermometer (wá'tér-thér-mom'e-tér), n. An instrument, in which water is substituted for mercury, for exhibiting the precise degree of temperature at which water attains its maximum density. This is at 39°.2 F. or 4° C., and from that point downward to the freezing point, 32° F. or 0° C., it expands, and it also expands from the same point upward to the boiling-point, 212° F. or 100° C. See water.

water-thief (wá'tér-thief), n. 1. A pirate. [Rare.]

Water-thieves and land-thieves; I mean pirates. Shak., M. of V., i. 3. 24.

2. A slender cylindrical tin can, 9 or 10 inches long and from 1½ to 2 inches thick, furnished with a bail, used to draw water from a cask through the bung-hole; a bung-bucket; so called because it is sometimes used by sailors to steal water when on short allowance.

water-thistle (wá'tér-this-l), n. The marsh-thistle, Carduus palustris, of the northern Old World. Britten and Holland. [Prov. Eng.]

water-thrush (wá'tér-thrush), n. 1. A bird of the genus Scirurus, as S. naevius or S. motacilla, common in the United States, and belonging to the American warblers, or Mniotiltidae. S. naevius is more fully called New York water-thrush, and S. motacilla the large-billed or Louisiana water-thrush. The name may have originally contrasted with wood-thrush, but this bird belongs to a different family. The nearest relative of these water-thrushes is a woodland species of the same genus, S. auricapillus, the golden-crowned thrush (figured under oven-bird), from which the two species named above differ markedly in inhabiting watery tangles and brakes. Also called water-wagtail. See cut under Scirurus.

2. Any bird of the family Pittidae; an Old World ant-thrush. See cut under Pittidae.—3. The water-ouzel, Cinclus aquaticus. [Local, Eng.]—4. Same as water-wagtail, 1. [Local, Eng.]

water-thyme (wá'tér-tím), n. See thyme.

water-tick (wá'tér-tik), n. A water-spider of the genus Hydrometra.

water-tiger (wá'tér-tí'gér), n. The larva of any water-beetle of the family Dytiscidae. See cut under decapodiiform.

The larvae are called water tigers, being long, cylindrical, with large flattened heads, armed with scissor-like jaws with which they seize other insects, or snip off the tails of tadpoles, while they are even known to attack young fishes, sucking their blood.

1. S. Packard, Guide to the Study of Insects, p. 435.

water-tight (wá'tér-tít), a. [= q. wasserdicht; as water + tight.] So tight as to resist the passage of water; impenetrable by water.—Water-tight compartment. See compartment, and compare cut under deck.

water-tightness (wá'tér-tít'nes), n. The property of being water-tight. The Engineer, LXIX. 118.

water-torch (wá'tér-tórch), n. The reed-mace or cattail, Typha latifolia; said to be so named from its fruiting spike being soaked in oil and lighted as a torch. Profr. Pop. Names of Brit. Plants.

water-tower (wá'tér-tou'ér), n. Same as stand-pipe, 7.

When the flames are blazing through the upper windows of a tall building . . . the value of what is called a water-tower is apparent. Scribner's Map, IX. 56.

water-treader (wá'tér-tred'ér), n. One who or that which treads water; hence, by poetical license, a ship.

When the water-treader far away
Had left the land, then plott'd they the day Of my long servitude. Chapman, Only-sees, XIV. 477.

water-tree (wá'tér-tré), n. See Tetracera.—Red water-tree, the sassy-bark. See Erythrophloeum.—Water-trefoil (wá'tér-tré foil), n. Same as bug-bean.

water-trunk (wá'tér-trungk), n. A cistern of planks lined with lead to hold water. Simmonds.

water-tube (wá'tér-tüb), n. 1. A pipe for rain-water.—2. One of a set of tubes which open upon the exterior of various invertebrates, and into which water may enter. They are supposed to have an excretory or a depuratory office analogous to that of kidneys. See water-pore, 1, water-vascular, and compare water-lung.—Water-tube boiler, a form of boiler in which the water circulates through pipes, and the flame wraps about them.

water-tupelo (wá'tér-tü'pe-lō), n. A form (Nyssa aquatica) of the black-gum or pepperidge, Nyssa sylvatica, having the base of the trunk greatly enlarged or swollen, found in ponds and swamps in the southern United States.

water-turkey (wá'tér-tér'ki), n. 1. The ankinga or snake-bird, Platys ankinga. See dar-ter, 3 (h) (1), and cut under ankinga. [Southern U. S.]—2. The wood-ibis, Tantalus loculator; more fully called Colorado water-turkey. See wood-ibis, and cut under Tantalus. [Southwestern U. S.]

water-twist (wá'tér-twist), n. The trade-name for cotton yarn spun on a water-frame. See water-frame.

water-twyer (wá'tér-twí'ér), n. In metal, a furnace blast-pipe or twyer kept cool (to prevent the burning of the nozzle) by means of a stream of water constantly passing through a pipe carried around or beside it.

water-vacuole (wá'tér-vak'ū-lō), n. One of the temporary vacuoles of many protozoans, consisting of a globule of water taken in with a particle of food. The circulation of these food-vacuoles or temporary stomachs represents a water-vascular system of the most primitive kind. See water-vascular.

water-varnish (wá'tér-vár'nish), n. A varnish made by using water as a solvent.—Lac water-varnish. See *lac*².

water-vascular (wá'tér-vas'kū-lār), a. In biol., pertaining to or providing for circulation of water in the body of an animal. The water-vascular system is seen in its utmost simplicity in infusorians, and in various degrees of complexity in higher invertebrates.

tebrates—in trematode worms, for example. Water-lungs and water-tubes belong to the water-vascular system. See also under Balanoglossus, Proctoncha, Rhabdolecis, and Rotifera.

water-vine (wá'tér-vín), n. 1. A plant of the genus Phytocrene.—2. A climbing shrub, Dalmanthus Calina of the Dilleniaceae, found in tropical America. [West Indies.]

water-violet (wá'tér-ví'ō-let), n. (a) A plant of the genus Hottonia, primarily H. palustris; so called from the likeness of its flowers to those of the stock-gillyflower, once called violet. Britten and Holland. See featherfoil. (b) Sometimes, same as lance-leaved violet (which see, under violet).

water-viper (wá'tér-ví'pér), n. See riper.

water-vole (wá'tér-vōl), n. The common water-rat or vole of Europe, Arvicola amphibius. See cut under water-rat.

The sudden dive of a water-vole.

R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, vii.

water-wagtail (wá'tér-wag tál), n. 1. A wagtail most properly so called; any species of Motacilla in a strict sense, as distinguished from Actitis. In England the name commonly specifies the pied wagtail, Motacilla lugubris. See cut under wagtail.—2. Same as water-thrush, 1.—Gray water-wagtail, yellow water-wagtail. Same as gray wagtail (which see, under wagtail).

waterway (wá'tér-wā), n. [< ME. water-wey, < AS. wa terweg; as water + wey.] 1. A channel or passage of water; a water-route; specifically, that part of a river, arm of the sea, or the like through which vessels enter or depart; the fairway.

Though the Thames was already a waterway by which London could communicate with the heart of England, no town save Oxford has as yet arisen along its course.

J. R. Green, Conq. of Eng., p. 419.

2. In ship-building, a name given to the thick planks at the outside of the deck, worked over the ends of the beams, and fitting against the inside of the top-timbers, to which, as well as to the ends of the beams, they are bolted, thus forming an important binding. Their inner edge is hollowed out to form a channel for water to run off the deck. In iron vessels the waterway assumes many different forms. See cut under beam, 2 (g).

The spencers we bent on very carefully, . . . and, making tackles fast to the clews, bowed them down to the water-ways. R. H. Dana, Jr., Before the Mast, p. 258.

The waterway, as its name would suggest, is a portion of the hull so situated that, in addition to its other functions, it forms a channel for carrying water to the scuppers on each side of the ship. Thearle, Naval Arch., § 209.

water-weak (wá'tér-wék), a. Weak as water; very feeble or weak.

If merrie now, anone with woe I weepe,

If lustie now, forthwith am water-weak.

Davies, Muse's Sacrifice, p. 10. (Davies.)

water-weed (wá'tér-wéd), n. 1. Any wild aquatic plant without special use or beauty.

The willful water-weeds held me thrall.

S. Lanier, The Century, XXVII. 819.

2. Specifically, the choke-pondweed or water-thyme, Elodea Canadensis (Anacharis Alsinastrum), of the Hydrocharitaceae. See pondweed and Babington's-curse.

water-weevil (wá'tér-wē'vī), n. A snout-beetle, Lissorhynchus simplex, which occurs in great numbers in the Georgia and South Carolina rice-fields, the adult feeding on the leaves of the rice, and the larvæ feeding on the roots under water.

Water-weevil (Lissorhynchus simplex), eight times natural size.

This beetle has gained its common name of water weevil from the fact that it is found only when the fields are overflowed.

L. O. Howard, U. S. Agricultural Report, 1881-2, p. 131.

water-wheel (wá'tér-hwēl), n. In hydraul.:

(a) A wheel moved by water, and employed to turn machinery. There are four principal kinds of water-wheels—the overshot wheel, the undershot wheel, the breast-wheel, and the turbine. (b) A wheel for raising water in large quantities, as the Persian wheel. See *wheel*¹. (c) The paddle-wheel of a steamer.—Bottom-discharge water-wheel. See bottom.—Lift water-wheel. (a) An undershot wheel. (b) A water-wheel the gudgeons and bearings of which may be raised or lowered to adapt the wheel to various heights of water-supply. E. H. Knight.—Radial-piston water-wheel, a form of breast-wheel having movable floats which extend radially outward to the breasting on the water side of the wheel to receive the pressure of the water during its descent, and are drawn inward as they rise on the opposite side of the wheel.—Water-wheel gate, a water-gate for controlling the quantity of water admitted to a wheel, according to the power required. See cut under scroll.—Water-wheel governor, a mechanism employed to produce uniformity of motion in a water-wheel.

water-white (wá'tér-hwīt), a. Perfectly transparent, as water; limpid and colorless. Spons' Encyc. Manuf., I. 646.

water-whorlgrass (wá'tér-hwér'l'grās), n. Same as water-hairgrass.

water-willow (wá'tér-wil'ō), n. 1. A European willow, sometimes named Salix aquatica, forming a variety of the common willow, S. Caprea, or if distinct, S. cinerea.—2. An American acanthaceous plant, Dianthera Americana, an herb 3 feet high, of willow-like aspect, growing in water, having purplish flowers in axillary peduncled spikes.

water-wing (wá'tér-wing), n. A wall erected on the bank of a river adjoining a bridge, to secure the foundations from the action of the current.

waterwitch (wá'tér-wich), n. 1. A witch who dwells in the water; a water-nixy.—2. A person who pretends to have the power of discovering subterranean springs by means of a divining-rod. Bartlett, Americanisms, p. 741.—3. One of several water-birds noted for their quickness in diving, as a kind of duck, the buff-headed duck, Clangula or Bucephala albeola, and especially various species of grebes or didappers, as the horned grebe, Podiceps cornu- tus, or the pied-billed dabchick, Podilymbus podiceps. See cuts under buffle, grebe, and Tachybaptus.—4. The stormy petrel, or Mother Carey's chicken. See cut under petrel.

water-withe (wā'tēr-wīth), n. A species of vine, Vitis Caribaea, which grows in the West Indies in parched districts. It is so full of clear sap or water that a piece of the stem two or three yards long is said to afford a plentiful draught.

water-wood (wā'tēr-wūd), n. A large rubiaceous tree, Chimarrhis cymosa, of river-banks in the West Indies.

waterwork (wā'tēr-wérk), n. 1. A structure, contrivance, or engine for conducting, distributing, or otherwise disposing of water; now commonly in the plural. Specifically—(a) An edifice with machinery constructed in London in 1594-5 for forcing up and conveying the water of the Thames to various parts of the city.

Titus, the brave and valorous young gallant,
Three years together in the town hath been,
Yet my Lord Chancellor's tomb he hath not seen,
Nor the new waterwork.

Sir J. Davies (3), Epigrams (1596), vi., In Titum.

Mam, shall serve the whole city with preservative
Weakly; each house his dose, and, at the rate—
Sur, As he that built the waterwork doth with water.

B. Jonson, Alchemist, ii. 1.

(b) [In plural form, as sing. or pl.] The aggregate of constructions and appliances for the collection, preservation, and distribution of water for domestic purposes, for the working of machinery, or otherwise for the use of a community. (c) An appliance through which water is spout d out in jets, sprays, or showers; a fountain; a hydraulic toy.

Some [gardens] are beautified with basons of water in open pavilions, or with fountains and little water works, in which, and their pleasant summer houses, their chief beauty consists. Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 123.

(c) pl. Same as tear-pump. [Humorous slang.]
Sneaking little brute, . . . clapping on the waterworks just in the hardest place.

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, ii. 5.

2*t.* A marine scene or pageant.

The first scene is a water-work presented by Oceanus, king of the sea.

Bekker, Londons Tempe (Works, ed. Pearson, IV. 118).
[In the following quotation the word is used punningly, with reference to the freezing over of the Thames during the winter of 1697-8.]

Court. Make me so much beholding to you as to receive from you the right picture of all these your water works. . . .
Cit. The Thames began to put on his "freeze-coat," which he yet wears, about the week before Christmas; and hath kept it on till now this latter end of January.

The Great Frost (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 83.)

3*t.* Painting with water or something soluble in water as a vehicle.—4. Hence, a textile fabric, as canvas, painted in this manner, and used instead of tapestry to decorate apartments.

The king for himself had a house of timber, . . . and for his other lodgings he had great and goodlie tents of blew water-work, garnished with yellow and white.

Hollinshed, Chronicle, III. 819.

For thy walls, a pretty slight drollery, . . . or the German hunting in water-work, is worth a thousand of these bed-hangings, and these fly-bitten tapestries.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., ii. 1. 158.

water-worker (wā'tēr-wér'kér), n. One whose work has to do with water: in provincial English use, a maker of meadow-drains and wet ditches. Halliwel.

water-worm (wā'tēr-wérn), n. A water annelid, as a nauid.

water-worn (wā'tēr-wörn), a. Worn by the action of water; especially, smoothed by the force or action of running water, or water in motion: as, water-worn pebbles.

waterwort (wā'tēr-wért), n. 1. A plant of the genus Elatine, or more broadly of the order Elatinaceæ, primarily E. Hydropiper of the Old World.—2. The plant Phylodrum lanuginosum, or (Lindley) any plant of the order Phylodracæ.

water-wraith (wā'tēr-rāth), n. A supposed water-spirit, whose appearance prognosticates death or woe to the person seeing it.

By this the storm grew loud apace;

The water-wraith was shrieking;

Campbell, Lord Elfin's Daughter.

watery (wā'tēr-i), a. [< ME. watery, watéri, watry, watri, < AS. watrig (= D. watrig = MHG. wezeric, wazzeric, G. wässrig), < water, water: see water.] 1. Abounding in, moist with, or containing water; discharging water; wet; dripping; watered; specifically, of the eyes, tearful or running.

"After sharpe shoures," quod Pees, "moste shene is the some;

Is no weder warmer than after watery cloudes."

Piers Plowman (19), xviii. 410.

This lady

Walks discontented, with her watery eyes

Bent on the earth.

Beau. and Fl., Maid's Tragedy, i. 1.

2. Consisting of water.

The queen o' the sky,
Whose watery arch and messenger am I [Iris].
Shak., Tempest, iv. 1. 71.

Far off from these a slow and silent stream,
Lethal, the river of oblivion, rolls
Her watery labyrinth. Milton, P. L., ii. 584.

3. Resembling water: suggestive of water. (a) Thin, as a liquid; of slight consistency.

Nowe this vynes, whose taketh kepe,
Not watery but thicke humours wepe.
Palladius, Hushondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 104.

Hence—(b) Weak; vapid; insipid.

The heorte, that was watery, smeechles, and he uelode no sauour of God. Ancren Riwle, p. 376.

Slight Sir Robert with his watery smile.

Tennyson, Edwin Morris.

(c) Liquid; soft, and more or less transparent; pale.

The chasin in which the sun has sunk is shut, . . .
And over it a space of watery blue,
Which the keen evening star is shining through.
Shelley, Evening.

Slant watery lights, from parting clouds, apace

Travel along the precipice's base.

Wordsworth, Evening Walk.

(d) Insipid and soft or flabby, as a fish or its flesh.

4. Pertaining to, connected with, or affecting water: specifically used of the moon, as governing the tide.

Whiles winter frets the seas, and watry Orion.
Surrey, Aeneid, iv. 67.

All springs reduce their currents to mine eyes,
That I, being govern'd by the watery moon,
May send forth plentiful tears to drown the world!
Shak., Rich. III., ii. 2. 69.

The watery god

Roll'd from a silver urn his crystal flood.

Dryden.

5*t.* Watering in desire, as the mouth; eager.

What will it be,
When that the watery palate tastes indeed Love's thrice repured nectar?
Shak., T. and C., iii. 2. 22.

6. In her.: (a) Bounded by, or ornamented by, wavy lines: a rare epithet used in blazoning fanciful modern bearings. (b) Same as undé.

[Rare.]—The watery start. See start.—Watery fusion. See aqueous fusion, under fusion.—Watery itch, scabies attended with the formation of vesicles.

water-yam (wā'tēr-yam), n. The latticeleaf; either of the plants Aponogeton (Ouvirandra) fenestralis and J. (O.) Bernieriana: so called from its aquatic growth and farinaceous root-stock. See latticeleaf and Ouvirandra.

water-yarrow (wā'tēr-yār'ō), n. The water-violet, Hyssopus palustris; so called from its leaves being finely divided like those of yarrow. Britten and Holland. [Prov. Eng.]

watht, n. [< Icel. vadh = Sw. rad, a ford: see wade, n.] A ford. Halliwel.

watheit, n. [< ME. wathe (also, after Icel., waith, wayth), < AS. waith, waith, hunting, game, = OHG. weida, MHG. G. weide, pasture, meadow, = Icel. veidhr, hunting, fishing. Cf. gain.] 1. The pursuit of game; hunting.

"3c, we ar in wadlonde," cothe the king, "and walkes on owre wayth.

For to huntte atte the herd, with bounde and with horne."

Autours of Arthur (ed. Robson), xxvii.

2. Game; prey.

Bi-fore alle the folk on the flette, frekez he beddez Verayly his veynsoun to fech hym byfome: . . .
"3c I wyssse," quoth that other wyge, "here is wayth fayrest
That I seg this seuen gere in sesoun of wynter."

Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), I. 1381.

God send you som wathe!

Now ar thise fowles done into seyr cowntre.

Towneley Mysteries, p. 33.

wathe², n. [< ME. wathe, wothe, < Icel. rādhi, danger, injury.] Peril; harm; danger.

Twre mon trewe restore,

Theme that [need] not drede no wathe.

Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), I. 2355.

He vawundit, I-wis, out of wathe paste.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 10696.

wathelyi, adv. [ME., < *wathe*² + -ly.] Dangerously; severely.

Ector done was to dethe, & his day past,

Achilles woundit full wathelyi in were of his lyffe.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 8-27.

Wroghte wayes fulle wyde, werraynde knyghtez,

And wondes alle wathelyi, that in the waye stondez!

Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), I. 2000.

Watling street. [< ME. Watlunge-strete, < AS. Watlunga stræt, lit. the Watlings' street; Watlunga, gen. pl. of Watlung, a descendant of Wecta (< Wetta, a man's name, + -ing); stræt, a road, street.] 1. A celebrated Roman road leading from London (and possibly from Dover) northwestward across Britain. Hence—2*t.* The Milky Way, the ordinary name of which implies that it is a road.

Se yonder, lo, the Galaxye,
The which men clepe the Milky Weye,
For hit ys white; and somme, parfoye,
Callen hit Watlynges strate.
Chaucer, House of Fame, I. 939.

watt (wot), n. [So called from the Scottish engineer and inventor James Watt (1736-1819).] The practical unit of electrical activity or power. The watt is equal to 10⁷ ergs per second, or the same number of absolute c. g. s. units of electrical activity; or it is the rate of working in a circuit when the E. M. F. is one volt and the current one ampere. One horse-power is equal to 746 watts.

watter, n. See *wat*³.

Watteau back. In dressmaking, an arrangement of the back of a woman's dress in which broad folds or plaits hang from the neck to the bottom of the skirt without interruption; by extension, any loose back to a dress, not girded at the waist. See cut under sack.

Watteau bodice. A bodice of a woman's dress having a square opening at the neck, and presenting some resemblance to the costumes in the paintings by the artist Watteau (beginning of the eighteenth century).

Watteau mantle. See mantle.

wattle (wot'), n. [Also dial. wadde: < ME. watel, < AS. watol, watol, a hurdle, in pl. twigs, thatching, tiles; cf. Bav. wadel, twigs, fir-branches, Swiss wedle, a bundle of twigs; perhaps akin to witthy, weed. Cf. wallet.] 1. A framework made of interwoven rods or twigs; a hurdle. See hurdle.

The walls are wattles, and the covering leaves.

Scott, The Poacher.

They are gallant hares, and the scent lies thick right across another meadow, . . . and then over a good wattle with a ditch on the other side.

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, i. 7.

2. A rod; a wand; a switch; a twig.

A Wattle, rod, vibex.

Levinus, Manip. Vocab. (E. E. T. S.), p. 38.

Nae whip nor spur, but just a wattle

O' saugh or hazel.

Burns, Farmer's Salutation to his Auld Mare.

3*t.* A basket; a bag or wallet. Piers Plowman (C), xi. 269.—4. In ornith., a fleshy lobe hanging from the front of the head; specifically, such a lobe of the domestic hen, or a like formation of any bird. Wattles most properly so called are paired, as in the hen, but may be single, as the dewlap of the turkey. They are very various in size, shape, and color, but are usually pendent, and of some bright tint, as red, yellow, or blue. They occur in several different orders of birds, and among species whose near relatives are devoid of such appendages. Similar lobes or flaps on the auriculars are sometimes called ear-wattles, though more properly ear-lobes. See wattle-bird, wattle-crow, phrases under watted, and cuts under Gallus and Rasores.

The combs or wattles (of young gamecocks) are to be cut as soon as they appear; and the cock chickens are to be separated as soon as they begin to peck each other.

6. In ichth., a fleshy excrescence about the mouth; a barbel.

The Barbel is so called, says Gesner, by reason of his barb or wattles at his mouth, which are under his nose or chaps.

L. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 106.

7. One of various Australian and Tasmanian acacias, valued to some extent for their wood and for their gum, but more for their bark, which is rich in tannin. For tannin the most important species are Acacia decurrens, or (if it is distinct from this, as appears to be the case) A. mollissima, the common black wattle, also called green or feathered wattle, and A. pyramantha, the broad-leaved or golden wattle. The silver wattle, A. dealbata, closely allied to the black wattle, is distinguished by the ashen color of its young foliage, and is a taller tree of moister ground. Its bark is inferior, but is considerably used for lighter leathers. Other species yielding tan-bark are A. saligna (A. leiophylla), the blackwood or lightwood, A. melanocylon, the native hickory (A. suberosa), A. pennineeris, etc. Several wattles yield a gum resembling gum arabic, somewhat exported for use in cotton-printing as an adhesive, etc. The principal sources of this product are the black wattle, the broad-leaved wattle, and A. homalophylla.

8. In her., a wattle or dewlap used in a bearing. Compare watted.—African wattle, a South African tree, Acacia Natalitia.—Alpine wattle, Acacia pravissima, a shrub or small tree of the Victorian Alps.—Black wattle, feathered wattle, golden wattle, green wattle. See def. 7. Prickly wattle, Acacia juniperina, an evergreen shrub of Australia and Tasmania.—Raspberry-jam wattle. Same as raspberry-jam tree.—Savannah wattle, two West Indian venenaceous trees, Citharexylum quadrangulum and C. cinerea.—Silver wattle. See def. 7. Soap-pod wattle. Same as soappod, 2.—Varnish-wattle, the Australian Acacia verniciflua.—Wallaby wattle, an Australian shrub, Acacia rigens.—Wattle and daub, a rough mode of building huts, cottages, etc., of interwoven twigs plastered with mud or clay: often used attributively: as, wattle-and-daub construction. Also wattle and daub.

Melbourne in those days was a straggling village, where the fathers of the settlement were content with slab shanties, or wattle-and-daub huts.

ted bee-eater and wattled crow by Latham, and pie à pandeloques by Daudin. Among its former New Latin names are Merops or Corvus carunculatus, Creadion carunculatum, and Corvus paradoxus. It inhabits Australia, and has ear-wattles about half an inch long. In a related species of Tasmania, A. inauris, the wattles are more than an inch long. The plumage is variegated with gray, brown, and white. Several other meliphagine birds are also wattled.

2. A wattle-crow, Glaucoptis cinerea, the cinereous wattle-bird of Latham.—3. A wattle-turkey.

wattle-crow (wot'ld-kro), n. Any bird of the group Glaucoptis or Callactinia; a wattled tree-crow; originally and specifically, the cinereous wattle-

Palsgrave, p. 772.

Beneath, stern Neptune shakes the solid ground; The forests wave, the mountains nod around.

Pope, Iliad, xx. 78.

2. To have an undulating form or direction; curve alternately in opposite directions.

To curl their waving hairs. Pope, R. of the L., ii. 97.

Thrice-happy he that may caress The ringlet's waving balm.

Tennyson, Talking Oak.

3. To give a signal by a gesture of movement up and down or to and fro.

A bloody arm it is, . . . and now It waves unto us!

B. Jonson, Catiline, i. 1.

She waved to me with her hand.

Tennyson, Maud, ix.

4. To waver in mind; vacillate.

They wave in and out, no way sufficiently grounded, no way resolved what to think, speak, or write.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 43.

II. trans. 1. To move to and fro; cause to shake, rock, or sway; brandish.

The Child of Elle hee fought see well,

As his weapon he waive amaine.

Specifically—2. To offer as a wave-offering. See wave-offering.

He shall wave the sheaf before the Lord, to be accepted for you.

Lev. xliii. 11.

3. To shape or dispose in undulations; cause to wind in and out, as a line in curves, or a surface in ridges and furrows.

Horns whelk'd and waved like the emridg'd sea.

Shak., Leir, iv. 6. 71.

This mud [caused by a land-slide] disported itself very much like lava flowing down inclined slopes, the terminations being escalloped, and the surface varied by small ridges likeropy lava.

Science, VI. 87.

4. To decorate with a waving or winding pattern. [Rare.]

He gine him th' armes which late I conquer'd in Asteropæus; forg'd of brass, and wav'd about with tin; 'Twill be a present worthy him.

Chapman, Iliad, xxiii. 482.

5. To signal by a wave of the hand, or of a flag, a handkerchief, or the like; direct by a waving gesture or other movement, as in beckoning.

We mistrusted some knavery, and, being waved by them to come a shore, yet we would not.

Hakluyt's Voyages, II. ii. 33.

Look, with what courteous action
It waves you to a more removed ground.

Shak., Hamlet, I. 4. 61.

6. To express, as a command, direction, farewell, etc., by a waving movement or gesture.

Perchance the maiden smiled to see Yon parting lingerer wave adieu.

Scott, L. of the L., ii. 5.

I retained my station when he waved to me to go, and announced, "I can not think of leaving you, sir."

Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xii.

7. To water, as silk. See water, v. t., 3.

The waved water chamelot was from the beginning esteemed the richest and bravest weaving.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, viii. 48.

wave¹ (wāv), n. [ME. wave, wave; < wave, v. The word wave in its most common sense has taken the place, in literary use, of the diff. noun wave, wave, a wave. The form wave could not, however, change into wave; see *wave*¹. The noun wave, as well as the verb, has been confused with *waive*¹.] 1. A disturbance of the surface of a body in the form of a ridge and trough, propagated by forces tending to restore the surface to its figure of equilibrium, the particles not advancing with the wave.

No ship yit karf the waves grene and blew.

Chaucer, Former Age, I. 21.

When you do dance, I wish you
A wave of the sea, that you might ever do Nothing but that.

Shak., W. T., iv. 4. 141.

2. Water; a stream; the sea. [Poetical.]

The laughing tides that lave
These Edens of the eastern wave.

Byron, The Giaour.

3. A form assumed by parts of a body which are out of equilibrium, such that as fast as the particles return they are replaced by others moving into neighboring positions of stress, so that the whole disturbance is continually propagated into new parts of the body while preserving more or less perfectly the same shape and other characters. In a somewhat wider sense the word is applied in cases where there is no progression through the body; thus, the shape of a vibrating piano-string may be called a wave. But in its narrowest and most proper sense it is restricted to an advancing elevation or depression of the surface of a body. An advancing elevation is called a positive wave, a depression a negative wave. Waves on the surfaces of liquids are distinguished into four orders. A wave of the first order, also called a wave of translation, leaves the particles, after its passage, shifted in the line of its motion. It is also called a solitary wave, because a single impulse produces but one elevation or depression, which has no definite length, but extends over the whole surface. The negative wave of this sort shortly breaks; it is only the positive wave, which leaves the particles in advance of their initial positions, which can be propagated far. This wave is also called Scott Russell's great wave, because it was first discovered by that engineer in 1834, and because, owing to its form, it cannot be seen unless it is very high. The velocity of such a wave is equal to $\sqrt{g(h+k)}$, where g is the acceleration of gravity, h the depth of the liquid in repose, and k the height of the crest of the wave above the plane of repose. This wave dies down of itself in a canal of uniform depth, independently of friction, and when it passes into shallow water it breaks as soon as h is no greater than k . A canal-bout produces such a wave, and consequently can be propelled at the rate of speed of the wave far more economically than at any other. In waves of the second order, called oscillatory waves, observation shows that each particle describes at a uniform rate of motion a circle in a vertical plane; but according to theory other orbits are possible. The particle at the crest of the wave is at the highest part of its path, that in the trough at the lowest. As long as the momentum of the particles is kept up, wave must succeed wave. If the water has a flow opposite to the direction of propagation of the waves and equal to it in velocity, it is plain that each particle will describe a prolate cycloid, and this is consequently the form of the waves. Waves thus brought to a standstill by the flow of the water are called standing waves. (See fig. 1.) They are often seen in rapidly running water.

Fig. 1. Standing waves in a torrent.

If the motion of the liquid is irrotational, theory shows that the waves cannot be cycloidal. But in regard to this whole subject neither theory nor observation can be trusted implicitly to give the truth of nature. The velocity of propagation of oscillatory waves, at least in deep water, is represented by the expression $\sqrt{g\lambda/2\pi}$, where λ is the length of the wave from crest to crest. But the velocity of propagation of a group of waves is much slower. Oscillatory waves break on a shelving shore when their height is about equal to the depth of the water, and from each one, as it breaks, a wave of the first order is produced. (See fig. 2.) Waves of the third order, called ripples, are distinguished from those of the second order in the fact that the shorter they are the more rapidly they move.

While an oscillatory wave 32 inches long will advance 3 feet per second, and one of 3 inches long only 1 foot per second, a ripple a quarter of an inch long will move 1 foot per second, a ripple an eighth of an inch long will move $\frac{1}{4}$ feet per second, and so on. The reason is that the force of restoration of the particles is here not chiefly gravity, but the surface-tension of the liquid. Ripples very rapidly die out. Waves of the fourth order are sound-waves. They are propagated in water at the rate of about 1,580 yards per second—that is, at a much greater speed than that of sound in air. In the case of sound propagated in the air, the waves are formed by the alternate forward and back motion of the air-particles in the direction in which the sound is being propagated; the waves are consequently waves of condensation and rarefaction, having in the free air a spherical form. The amplitude of vibration or excursion of each particle is very small, but the wave-length is large—for the middle C of the keyboard, about $\frac{1}{4}$ feet. A sound-wave travels in air about 1,100 feet per second. (See further under sound.) In the case of radiant energy (heat and light) propagated through the ether, the ether-particles vibrate transversely to the line of propagation; here the wave-length is very small—for violet light, about 0.000,016 of an inch, for red about twice this length, while the dark heat-waves, though much longer, are still very minute (see spectrum). A light-wave (or, more generally, an ether-wave) travels in space about 185,000 miles per second. Hertz has shown recently (1887) that by a very rapid oscillating electrical discharge, as between two knobs, a disturbance is produced in the surrounding ether which is propagated as electric waves with a velocity like that of light. These electric waves in Hertz's experiments were found to have a wave-length of upward of one meter. They are reflected from the surface of a conductor, but are transmitted by a non-conductor, as pitch, and may be brought to a focus; they may be made to interfere, then forming nodal points, and by passage through a grating of parallel wires they may be polarized. These electric waves are hence in all essential respects like light-waves, but differ in their relatively enormous length and the corresponding slowness of the oscillations. These experiments of Hertz form a most important confirmation of the electromagnetic theory of light proposed by Maxwell (see light).

That which in waves of fluid is rest is in waves of sound silence, and in waves of light darkness.

Lommel, Light (trans.), p. 220.

The reason why one end of the coloured band [spectrum] . . . is red and the other blue is that in light as in sound we have a system of disturbances or waves; we have long waves and short waves, and what the low notes are to music the blue waves are to light.

J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 34.

4. One of a series of curves in a waving line, or of ridges in a furrowed surface; an undulation; a swell.

The ears are furnished with feather to the same extent, with a slight wave, but no curl.

Dogs of Great Britain and America, p. 107.

5. Figuratively, a flood, influx, or rush of anything, marked by unusual volume, extent, uprising, etc., and thus contrasted with preceding and following periods of the opposite character; something that swells like a sea-wave at recurring intervals; often, a period of intensity, activity, or important results; as, a wave of religious enthusiasm; waves of prosperity.

A light wind blew from the gates of the sun,

And waves of shadow went over the wheat.

Tennyson, The Poet's Song.

An emotional wave once roused tends to continue for a certain length of time. A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 32.

Specifically—6. In meteor., a progressive oscillation of atmospheric pressure or temperature, or an advancing movement of large extent in which these are considerably above or below the normal; as, an air-wave, barometric wave, cold wave, warm wave, etc. The term barometric wave is often restricted to those changes in atmospheric pressure which are not connected with cyclonic disturbances nor with the regular diurnal variation, but which include progressive oscillations of a varied character and origin, ranging from those of a short wave-length, which occupy but a fraction of a minute in their passage, to those which cover thousands of miles and occupy several days in their development and subsidence. The remarkable air-waves generated by the eruption of Krakatoa are shown by barographic traces to have had an initial velocity of 700 miles an hour, and to have traveled round the earth not less than seven times.

7. A waved or wavy line of color or texture; an undulation; specifically, the undulating line or streak of luster on cloth watered and calendered.—8. A waving; a gesture, or a signal given by waving.

With clear-ringing wave

9. A hook-name of certain geometrid moths. Thus, Acridalia rubicincta is the tawny wave; A. contigularia is Greening's wave; Venusia canbarraria is the Welsh wave, etc.—Barometric wave. See def. 6.—Cold wave, a progressive movement of an area of relatively low temperature. It is preceded by an area of low pressure, and is, in the United States, directly associated with the north-westerly winds which follow a cyclonic depression and accompany the advance of an area of high barometer. The cold wave is, in the United States, in most cases an out-pour of cold dry air from the barren plains of British America, where the air is cooled during the long nights of winter to a very low temperature. In Texas and the Gulf of Mexico the cold wave is termed a norther. The approach of cold waves is made a subject of forecast by the United States Weather Bureau. (See under signal.) A decided fall of temperature of less extent, such as frequently occurs in other than winter months, is termed a cold wave. [U. S.]

When the fall of temperature in twenty-four hours is twenty degrees or more, and covers an area of at least fifty thousand square miles, and the temperature in any part of the area goes as low as 36°, it is called a cold-wave. Amer. Jour. Sci., 3d ser., XL. 403.

Dicrotic wave. See dicrotic.—Hot wave, warm wave, a progressive movement, generally eastward, of an area of relatively high temperature, but without so definite a boundary and character as distinguishes a cold wave. The general conditions of a warm wave, or heated term, in summer are pressure decreasing to the northward, southerly winds, fair or hazy weather, with practically unbroken insolation, and, in some cases, such an amount of vapor in the air as to diminish the usual nocturnal radiation. [U. S.]

Storm-wave. (a) A sea-wave raised at the center of a cyclonic storm by the low atmospheric pressure and the force of the winds.

It advances with the progressive motion of the storm, and has all the properties of a true wave. When augmented by a heavy fall of rain, and blown by strong winds upon a low shore, the storm-wave causes disastrous inundations.

The thickly populated low-lands at the head of the Bay of Bengal have been the scene of frequent storm-floods, occasioning enormous losses of life and property. (b) In general, on sea-coasts, the increased wave-motion accompanying storms.—

Wave of translation. See def. 3. (See also brain-wave, pubs-wave.)—

Syn. 1. Wave, Billow, Surge, Breaker, Surf, Swell, Ripple.—

Wave is the general word. A billow is a great round and rolling wave. Surge is only a somewhat stronger word for billow. A breaker is a wave breaking or about to break upon the shore or upon rocks. Surf is the collective name for breakers; as, to bathe in the surf; it is sometimes popularly used for the foam at the edge or crest of the breaker. Swell is the name for the fact of the rising (and falling) of water, especially after the wind has subsided, or for the water that so rises (and falls), or for any particular and occasional disturbance of water by such rising (and falling); as, the boat was swamped by the swell from the steamer. Ripple is the name for the smallest kind of wave.

The high watery walls came rolling in, and at their highest tumbled into surf. . . . Some white-headed billows thundered on. . . . The breakers rose, and, looking over one another, here one another down, and rolled in, in interminable hosts. . . . The sea . . . carried men, spars, . . . into the boiling surge.

Dickens, David Copperfield, iv.

This mounting wave will roll us seaward soon.

Tennyson, Lot's-Eldest.

Across the boundless east we drove,

Where those long swells of breaker-sweep

The muting rocks and isles of Chave.

Tennyson, The Voyage.

As the shadows of sun-gilt ripples

On the golden bed of a brook.

Lowell, The Changeling.

wave², v. A former spelling of waive.

wave³. An obsolete preterit of *wave*¹.

wave-action (wāv'ak shən), n. See action.

wave-breast (wāv'breſt), n. A breast offered as a wave-offering (which see).

waved (wāvd), a. [*wave*¹ + -ed.]

1. Having a waving outline or appearance. See *wave*¹, v. t. Specifically—

(a) In zool., marked with waves; wavy in color or texture; undulated. (b) In entom., crenate or crenulate, as a margin; sinuous; undulated. (c) In arms, shaped in waves or undulations, as the edges of certain swords and daggers.

Heavy swords of the middle ages were sometimes shaped in this way, apparently with the object of breaking plates of armor the more readily. In the Malay creese, however, the object is probably to make a more dangerous wound.

Malay Creese, with blade.

2. Same as watered: noting silk, forged steel, etc.—3. In bot., undulate.—4. In her., same as wave.—Waved sandpiper. See sandpiper.—Waved sword, in her., a flamboyant sword used as a bearing.—Waved wheel. See wheel.

wave-front (wāv'frunt), n. The continuous line or surface including all the particles in the same phase. It is a spherical surface for sound, and for light in an isotropic medium.

wave-goose (wāv'gōs), n. The brant- or Brent-goose, Bernicla brenta. [Durham, Eng.]

wave-length (wāv'length), n. The distance between the crests of two adjacent waves, or between the lowest parts of the depressions on each side of a wave; more generally, the distance between any particle of the disturbed medium and the next which is in the same phase with it. See wave 1, 3.

The wave-length of a ray of light in any given substance is consequently obtained by dividing the wave-length in air by the index of refraction of the substance itself.

Lommel, Light (trans.), p. 245.

No difference but that of wave-length is recognized between waves of radiant heat and of radiant light.

Sci. Amer. Supp., p. 8801.

waveless (wāv'les), a. [< wave 1 + -less.] Free from waves; undisturbed; unagitated; still.

Smoother than this waveless spring.

Peete, David and Bethsabe.

The mist that sleeps on a waveless sea.

Hogg, Kilmeny.

Unmoved the bannered blazonry hung waveless as a pall.

Barham, Inglorious Legends, II. iii.

wavelet (wāv'let), n. [< wave 1 + -let.] A small wave; a ripple.

Like the vague sighings of a wind at even,

That wakes the wavelets of the shimmering sea.

Shelley, Queen Mab, viii.

The head, with its thin wavelets of brown hair, indents the little pillow wave-line (wāv'lin), n. 1. The outline of a wave; specifically, in physics, the path of a wave of light, sound, etc., or the graphic representation of such a path.—2. Naut., the general outline of the surface of sea-waves; specifically used attributively to note a method of ship-building devised by J. Scott Russell, in which the lines of the hull of a vessel are adapted scientifically to the lines of the waves, and are nearly or quite cycloidal.—3. One of the series of lines or furrows produced by the sea-waves upon a sandy beach.

wavellite (wāv'el-īt), n. [Named after William Wavell, an English medical practitioner (died 1829), by whom it was discovered.] A hydrous phosphate of aluminium, commonly found in radiated hemispherical or globular crystalline concretions from a very small size to 1 inch in diameter, and of a white to yellow-green or brown color. See cut under radiate.

wave-loaf (wāv'lōf), n. A loaf for a wave-offering.

Ye shall bring out of your habitations two wave loaves of two tenth deals.

Lev. xiii. 17.

wave-molding (wāv'mōl'ding), n. In arch., a molding of undulating outline, resembling more or less closely a succession of waves; particularly, a molding of Greek origin, much used in Renaissance and modern architecture, having the character of a series of breaking waves, much conventionalized.

wave-motion (wāv'mō'shon), n. Motion in curves alternately concave and convex like that of the waves of the sea; undulatory motion. See wave 1, 3.

While ether-waves are in course of traversing the ether, there is neither heat, light, nor chemical decomposition; merely wave-motion, and transference of energy by wave-motion.

A. Daniell, Prin. of Physics, p. 434.

The essential characteristic of wave-motion is that a disturbance of some kind is handed on from one portion of a solid or fluid mass to another.

P. G. Tait, Encyc. Brit., XIV. 603.

wave-offering (wāv'ōf-er-ing), n. In the ancient Jewish law, an offering presented with a horizontal movement of the hands forward and backward and toward the right and left, whereas the heave-offering was elevated and lowered.

wave-path (wāv'pāth), n. The line along which any point in any wave is propagated. [Rare.]

The radial lines along which an earthquake may be propagated from the centre are called wave-paths.

J. Milne, Earthquakes, p. 9.

waver 1 (wāv'vēr), v. [< ME. waveren, wāveren, vacillate, *< AS. as if wafuran vel. waftra, wavering, wandering, restless: said of flame and fire, the mind or spirit, etc.] = MIG. wāveren, G. dial. wahern, waver, totter, move to and fro, = lecl. rafa, hover about, = Norw. verra, flap about; also, with var. suffix, MIG. wablen, wablen, fluctuate, waver, = lecl. rafa, hover about (see wabble); freq. of the verb represented by waver 1, q. v.] 1. Intrans. 1. To move up and down or to and fro; wave; float; flutter; be tossed or rocked about; sway.

All in wer for to wait, waqwerode he sote,
But he held hym on horse, honyt o lofte.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 8206.

For an Outlawe, this is the Lawe,
That Men hym take and lunde,
Without pyte, hanged to bece,
And waver with the Wynde.

The Nut-Brown Maid, quoted by Prior (Poems, [ed. 1756, I. 147].

The wind in his raiment wavered.

William Morris, Sigurd, II.

2. To quiver; flicker; glimmer; glance.

As when a sunbeam wavers warm
Within the dark and dimpled beck.

Tennyson, Miller's Daughter.

3. To falter; fail; reel; totter.

Keep my wits, Heaven! I feel 'em wavering;
Oh God, my head!

Fletcher, Pilgrim, III. 3.

How many wavering steps can we retrace in our past lives!

Channing, Perfect Life, p. 74.

Like the day of doom it seemed to her wavering senses.

Longfellow, Evangeline, I. 5.

4. To be undetermined or irresolute; fluctuate; vacillate.

Therefore be sure, and waver not of God's love and favour towards you in Christ.

J. Bradford, Letters (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 132.

He that wavereth is like a wave of the sea driven by the wind and tossed.

Jas. i. 6.

I expect you should solicit me as much as if I were wavering at the Gate of a Monastery, with one Foot over the Threshold.

Congere, Way of the World, IV. 5.

= Syn. 1 and 4. Vacillate. See fluctuate.—4. Heitate, etc. See scruple.

II.† trans. 1. To cause to wave or move to and fro; set in waving motion; brandish.

Item, if the Admirall shall happen to hull in the night, then to make a wavering light over his other light, wavering the light upon a pole.

Hakluyt's Voyages, III. 147.

2. To demur or scruple about; hesitate at; shrink.

The inconstant Barons wavering every hour
The fierce encounter of this hoistrons time
That easily might her livelihood devour.

Drayton, Barons' Wars, I. 34.

waver 2 (wāv'vēr), n. [< wave 1 + -er 1.] One who or that which waves; specifically, in printing, an inking-roller; an apparatus which distributes ink on the table or on other rollers, but not on the form of types: so called from its vibratory movement.

As the carriage returns, this strip of ink is distributed on the inking table by rollers placed diagonally across the machine. The diagonal position gives them a waving motion; hence they are called wavers.

Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 706.

waver 3 (wāv'vēr), n. [Perhaps < wave 1 + -er 1 (?).] A sapling or timbering left standing in a fallen wood. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

As you pass along, prune and trim up all the young wavers.

Evelyn, Sylva, III. i. 7.

waver-dragon (wāv'vēr-drag'gŭn), n. [< waver for wirer + dragon.] In her., the wivern.

waverer (wāv'vēr-ēr), n. [< wave 1 + -er 1.] One who or that which wavers or fluctuates; especially, a person who vacillates or is undecided in mind.

Come, young waverer, come, go with me,

Shak., R. and J., II. 3. 89.

This prospect of converting votes was a dangerous distraction to Mr. Brooke; his impression that waverers were likely to be allured by wavering statements . . . gave Will Ladislaw much trouble.

George Eliot, Middlemarch, II.

waveringly (wāv'vēr-ing-lē), adv. In a wavering, vacillating, or irresolute manner.

Loke not waveringly about you, haue no distrust, be not afraid.

J. Udal, On 1 Pet. v.

waveringness (wāv'vēr-ing-nes), n. The character or state of a waverer; vacillation.

The waveringness of our cupidities turneth the minde into a dizziness unawares to itself.

W. Montague, Devoutne Essays, Pref.

waver-roller (wāv'vēr-rō'lēr), n. In printing, a roller made to vibrate in a diagonal direction on the inking-table of a printing-machine for the purpose of distributing the ink.

wavery (wāv'vēr-ē), a. [< waver 1 + -y 1.] Wavering; unsteady; shaky; faltering.

old letters closely covered with a wavery writing.

Miss Thackeray, Book of Sibyls, p. 4.

He's . . . wavery; . . . his love changes like the seasons.

Christian Union, July 28, 1887.

wave-shell (wāv'shel), n. In earthquake-shocks, one of the waves of alternate compression and expansion, having theoretically the form of concentric shells, which are propagated in all directions through the solid materials of the earth's crust from the seismic focus to the earth's surface. Encyc. Brit., VII. 610.

waveson (wāv'son), n. [Appar. irreg. < wave 2, waive, + -son, after the analogy of flotsion, jetsion, jettison, otherwise flotsam, jetsam.] A name given to goods which after a shipwreck appear floating on the sea.

wave-surface (wāv'sēr'fās), n. A surface whose equation in rectangular coördinates is

If upon every central section of a quadric surface be erected a perpendicular at the center, and points be taken on this perpendicular at distances from the center equal to the axes of the section, then the locus of these points will be the wave-surface. It is frequently called Fresnel's wave-surface, to distinguish it from Huygens's wave-surface, which is simply an ellipsoid—the latter being the form of the wave-front of a uniaxial crystal, the former that of a biaxial crystal.—Malus's wave-surface [discovered by E. L. Malus (1775–1812) in 1810], a surface of the wave-front of light emanating from a point but undergoing reflections and refractions at different surfaces.

wave-trap (wāv'trap), n. In hydraulic engin., a widening inward of the spaces between piers, to afford space to permit waves rolling in between the piers to lose force by spreading themselves.

wave-worn (wāv'wōrn), a. Worn by the waves.

The shore that o'er his wave-worn basis bow'd.

Shak., Tempest, II. i. 120.

wavey, wavy 2 (wāv'vī), n.; pl. waveys, wavies (-vīz). [From Amer. Ind. name wawa.] A goose of the genus Chen: a snow-goose.

Shooting Wavies on the little lakes with which this region [the Red River country] is dotted is said to be a favorite amusement of the sportsmen.

Sportsman's Gazetteer, p. 192.

Blue wavey, the blue-winged goose, Chen caerulescens.—Horned wavey, the smallest snow-goose, Chen (Eutamias) rossii, which has at times the base of the bill studded with tubercles. It is exactly like the snow-goose in plumage, but no larger than a mallard, and inhabits arctic America, coming southward in migration. It was recognizably described under its present name by Hearne, but lost sight of for nearly a century, till brought again to notice, in 1861, by J. Cassin.—White wavey, the snow-goose. See cut under Chen.

wavily (wāv'vī-lē), adv. In a wavy manner, form, or direction.

Mr. Rappit, the hair-dresser, with his well-anointed coronal locks tending wavily upward.

George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, I. 9.

waviness (wāv'vī-nes), n. The state or quality of being wavy or undulating.

waving-frame (wāv'ving-frām), n. In printing, a frame which carries inking-rollers.

The frame which supports the inking-rollers, called the waving-frame, is attached by hinges to the general framework of the machine; the edge of the stereotype plate cylinder is indented, and rubs against the waving-frame, causing it to vibrate to and fro, and consequently to carry the inking-rollers with it, so as to give them an unceasing traverse motion.

Ure's Dict., III. 655.

wavy 1 (wāv'vī), a. [< wave 1 + -y 1.] 1. Abounding in waves.

This said, she divid'd into the wavy seas.
Chapman, Odyssey, iv. 569.

2. Undulating in movement or shape; waviness; as, wavy hair.

Let her glad Vallies smile with wavy Corn.

Prior, Carmen Seculare (1700), st. 26.

The wavy swell of the sighing reeds.

Tennyson, Dying Swan.

3. In bot., undulating on the border or on the surface. See cut under repand.—4. In her., same as undé.—5. In entom., presenting a series of horizontal curves: noting marks or margins. It is distinct from waved: but the two epithets are somewhat loosely used, and are sometimes interchanged.—6. In zool., undulating; sinuous; waved; having waved markings.—Barry wavy. See barry 2.—Sword wavy. See sword 1.—Wavy respiration. Same as interrupted respiration (which see, under respiration).

wavy², n. See wavey.

wavy-barred (wá'vi-bárd), a. Crossed with waving lines; undulated; as, the wavy-barred sable, a British moth. See sable, n., 1.

waw¹, n. [ME. waw, waze, wagh, waugh, a wave, < AS. wæg = OS. wæg = OFries. weg, wei = MD. weghe = MLG. wäge = OHG. wäg (> F. vague), MLG. wāc, G. woge = Goth. wēgs, a wave; < AS. wegan, etc., bear, carry, move; see weigh, *weigh*¹, and cf. *waw*².] A wave.

For, whiles they fly that Gulfes devoyning jawes,
They on this rock are rent, and sunek in helpes waves.
Spenser, F. Q., II. xii. 4.

waw², v. t. [ME. wawen, wazien, < AS. wagian, stir, move, = OHG. wagen, move, = Goth. wagan, move; a secondary form of AS. wegan, etc., bear, carry; see weigh, and cf. *waw*¹.] To stir; move; wave.

What wenten ye out in to desert for to see? a reed wawit with the wynd?
Wyclif, Luke vii. 24.

waw³, n. [ME. wawe, wagh, wag, wuh, wowe, wough, woub, < AS. wæg, wāh = OFries. wach = MD. weeghe = lecl. wegg = Sw. vägg = Dan. væg, a wall.] A wall. Piers Plowman (B), iii. 61.

waw⁴ (wā), v. i. [ME. wawen; imitative; cf. waul, waul.] To cry as a cat; waul.

wawah (wā'wā), n. Same as wow-wow. Encyc. Brit., IV, 57.

wawel, interj. and n. A Middle English form of woc.

wawl, v. i. See waul.

wawliet, n. An obsolete form of *waly*¹.

wawproos (wā'prōs), n. [Amer. Ind.] The American varying hare, Lepus americanus.

waw-waw (wā'wā), n. [W. Ind.] See Rajania.

wawyt (wā'y), n. [*cf. waw*¹ + -y.] Abounding in waves; wavy.

I saw come over the wavy flood.
The Isle of Ladies, l. 697.

wax¹ (waks), v. i. [ME. waxen, wacen (pret. wex, wex, wor, wax, wæc, pl. wexen, woxen, pp. waten, wæcen, woxen), < AS. weacan (pret. wæc, pp. gewæcen) = OS. wahan = OFries. waca = D. wassen = OHG. wahan, MLG. waken, G. waschen = lecl. waca = Sw. växa = Dan. vaxe = Goth. waksjan (pret. wōks, pp. wahsun), grow, increase, wax; = Gr. αἰσάνω, wax, Skt. √ raksh, wax, grow; appar. an extension of the root seen in L. augere, increase, AS. ecean, increase; see cke, and augment, auction, etc. Hence ult. *wax*¹, n., waxist.] 1. To grow; increase in size; become larger or greater; as, the moon waxes and wanes.

So is pryde waxen

In religioun and in alle the rewme amonge riche and pore,
That preyeres hane no power the pestilence to lette.

Piers Plowman (B), x. 75.

Sothli the child wax, and was comfortfull, ful of wysdom; and the grace of God was in him. Wyclif, Luke ii. 40.

The child he kept and nourished till it was feire well wozen, and that he myght ride after to court.

Martin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 238.

A waxing moon, that soon would wane.

Dryden, Pal. and Arc., iii. 649.

Thou shalt wax and he shall dwindle.

Tennyson, Boadicea.

2. To pass from one state to another; become; grow; as, to wax strong; to wax old.

And every man that ought hath in his cofre,

Lat him appere and waxe a philosofe.

Chaucer, Prolog. to Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 281.

Now charity is wax-n cold, none helpeth the scholar nor yet the poor.

Lattimer, Sermon of the Plough.

First he wax pale, and then wax red.

Scott, Thomas the Rhymer, iii.

The commander of Fort Casimir, when he found his martial spirit waxing too hot within him, would sally forth into the fields and lay about him most lustily with his sabre.

Ireving, Knickerbocker, p. 315.

Waxing kernels, enlarged lymph-nodes sometimes found in the groin in children; so called because supposed to be associated with growth.

wax¹ (waks), n. [ME. wax, were (= MLG. waks, increment, increase; also in comp., MD. wasdom = G. wachstum, growth); from the verb.] 1. Growth; increase; prosperity.

Ful nobly yet the almes yef and do;

Aboute hym gret wex, fair store, and gret light.

Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 653.

2. A wood. Halliwel, [Prov. Eng.]

wax² (waks), n. [ME. wax, wer, < AS. weax = OS. waks = OFries. war = D. was = OHG. MLG. waks, G. wachs = lecl. wax = Sw. var = Dan. var, wax; cf. OBulg. woskū = Bohem. wosk = Pol. wosk = Russ. woskū = Hung. woskū = Lith. waszkas, wax (perhaps < Tout.). Some compare L. riscum, mistletoe, bird-lime; see riscum.] 1. A thick, sticky substance secreted by bees, and used to build their cells; the material of honeycomb; beeswax. In its natural state it is of a dull-yellow color, and smells of honey. Its consistency varies with the temperature; it is ordinarily a pliable solid, readily melted. When purified and bleached, it becomes translucent white, is less tenacious, without taste or smell, and of a specific gravity a little less than that of water. It softens at 80° F., becoming extremely plastic, and retaining any form in which it may be molded, like clay or putty, and melts at 155° F. In chemical composition, wax consists of variable proportions of three substances, called myricin, cerolein, and cerotic acid. Wax is used for many purposes, both in its natural state and variously prepared. As bleached, and also then variously tinted, it is made into wax candles, which give a peculiarly soft light. In pharmacy it enters into the composition of various plasters, ointments, and cerates, as a vehicle for the active ingredients, and to confer upon the preparation a desired consistency. It has various uses in the plastic arts, especially in the making of anatomical models, artificial flowers and fruits, casts and impressions of various kinds, etc.

This pardoner hadde heer as yelow as wex.
Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 675.

I'll work her as I go; I know she's wax.
Beau. and Fl., Coxcomb, ii. 2.

Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, [l. 283.]

2. One of various substances and products resembling beeswax in appearance, consistency, plasticity, and the like, or used for like purposes. (a) The substance worked up from the pollen of flowers by the hind legs of bees, and used to feed their larvae; bee-bread, formerly supposed to be beeswax. (b) The substance secreted by various coccids or wax-scales, especially such as has commercial value. (See wax-insect, l.) (c) The product of some other homopterous insects. (See wax-insect, 2.) This is more or less stringy and flocculent, and approaches in character the froth or spume of the spittle-insects, but in some cases is usable like beeswax. (d) The secretion of the sebaceous glands of the outer ear; cerumen; ear-wax. (e) A vegetable product which may be regarded as a concrete fixed oil, the principal varieties being Chinese wax, cow-tree wax, carnauba wax, and Japan wax. It may be obtained from the pollen of many flowers, and it forms a part of the green fecula of many plants, particularly of the cabbage. It appears as a varnish upon the fruit or the upper surface of the leaves of many trees, as the wax-palm and wax-myrtle. Also called vegetable wax. See cut under Myrica. See also wax-tree, and compounds below. (f) A mineral product, one of certain fossil hydrocarbons which occur in small quantities generally in the Carboniferous formation; called more fully mineral wax. The most familiarly known variety is ozocerite. (g) A substance used for sealing.

Quomodo. He will never trust his hand in wax and parchment, as many gentlemen have done before him.

Easy. A by-blow for me.

Middleton, Michaelmas Term, iv. 1.

A letter! hum! a suspicious circumstance, to be sure! What, and the seal a true-lover's knot now, ha? or an heart transfixed with darts; or possibly the wax bore the industrious impression of a thumb.

Colman, Jealous Wife, i.

(h) A thick resinous substance, consisting of pitch, resin, and tallow, used by shoemakers for rubbing their thread.

3. A thick syrup produced by boiling down the sap of the sugar-maple tree, cooling on ice, etc. [Local, U. S.]—4. Dung of cattle. [Western U. S.]—5. In coal-mining, puddled clay, used for dams and stoppings.—Brazil wax. Same as carnauba wax.—Butter of wax. See butter.—Carnauba wax, a secretion of the young leaves of the carnauba palm, Copernicia cerifera, of Brazil, which is used in making candles and is exported in large quantities.

—Chinese or China wax, a hard white wax, the product of a scale-insect. See gria and wax-insect, 1 (a).—Ear-wax. See def. 2 (d) and cerumen.—Grafting-wax, a mixture made of resin, beeswax, and linseed-oil, for coating the incisions made in a tree in grafting.

—Ibota wax, a product in Japan of the shrub Ligustrum flota.—Japan wax, a wax obtained in Japan from the drupes of the wax tree Rhus succedanea, by crushing, steaming, and pressing.

It is used chiefly for candles, and largely exported. The fruit of the lacquer-tree, Rhus varicifera, yields a still better wax.—Mineral wax. See def. 2 (f).—Nose of wax. See nose.—Paraffin wax, a white substance resembling wax, obtained chiefly from the distillation of petroleum, but also produced in the distillation of coal, wood, and other substances. It is a neutral, easily fusible substance, unaltered by acids or alkalis, and hence has a wide range of uses in the arts.—Vegetable wax, any wax of vegetable origin. See def. 2 (e). The name once denoted specifically myrtle-wax.—Wax dam, a dam of puddled clay.—Wax doll. See wax-doll.—Wax impression, in dentistry, a copy in wax of parts of the mouth, taken usually for the purpose of fitting the plate for artificial teeth.—Wax opal, a variety of common opal having a resinous wax-like luster.—Wax wall, a dam of puddled clay. [Leicestershire coal-field, Eng.]—White wax.

(a) Bleached beeswax. (b) Chinese wax, or pela. (See also banking-wax, bottle-wax, myrtle-wax, ocaba-wax, sealing-wax.)

wax² (waks), v. [ME. wacen, wacen; < *wax*², n.] 1. trans. To treat with wax; smear or rub with wax; make waxy; as, to wax a thread; to wax the floor or a piece of furniture.

The tok 1 and wexede my labe in maner of a peyre tables to resceyve distynctly the prikkys of my compas.

Chaucer, Astrolabe, ll. 8, 10.

He held a long string in one hand, which he drew through the other hand incessantly, as he spoke, just as a shoemaker performs the motion of sewing his thread.

O. W. Holmes, The Atlantic, LXVI, 633.

Waxed end, in shoemaking, a thread the end of which has been stiffened by the use of shoemakers' wax, so as to pass easily through the holes made by the awl; also, a waxed thread terminating in a bristle, for the same purpose. Also reduced to wax-end.—Waxed paper. See paper.

II. intrans. To plaster with clay. [Leicestershire coal-field, Eng.]

wax³ (waks), n. [Appar. < *wax*², v., taken in sense of 'rub,' hence 'beat, thrash,'] A rage; a passion. [Colloq.]

H. Kingsley, Ravenshoe, v.

wax-berry (waks'ber'i), n. The bayberry, Myrica cerifera.

waxbill (waks'bil), n. One of numerous small Old World birds of the family Ploceidae and subfamily Spernestinae, whose bills have a certain waxen appearance, due to the translucency of the horny covering, which may be white, pink, red, etc. The name appears to have attached more particularly to the members of the genus Estrella in a broad sense, but is of extensive and varied application. The Java sparrow is a good example. (See cut under sparrow.) The original waxbill, first so named by Edwards in 1751, the waxbill grosbeak of Latham (1783), Loxia astrild of Linnaeus, and now Estrella astrild, or Estrella astrild, or Estrella astrild (for the name thus wavers in spelling), is a South African bird, ranging as far as Matabeleland on the east and Bamaraland on the west coast. It has also been introduced in various places, and is a well-known cage-bird. It is scarcely over 4 inches long, the wing and tail each about 1½ inches; the bill is bright-red; the eyes and feet are brown. The general aspect is that of a brown bird, but this ground-color is intricately varied with several other colors. The vent is black, and there is a crimson streak on each side of the head. The blue-breasted waxbill (E. cyanoptera), the orange-checked (E. meloptera), the red-bellied (E. rubrinervis), the grenadier (E. rufinucha), and various others are among the small exotic birds which form the dealer's stock of manikins, senegals, blood-thrushes, strawberry-finches, paddy-birds, and the like.

wax-insect (waks'in'sekt), n. 1. One of various coccids or bark-lice which secrete wax; a wax-scale. Nearly all the Coccidae secrete a kind of wax, but that of but few is abundant enough to be of commercial value. Specifically—(a) The Chinese wax insect, Eriococcus pela (formerly Coccus sinensis or C. pela), related to the cochineal bug. It furnishes most of the white wax of commerce, specified as Chinese wax and pela. This insect, a native of China, occurs upon plants of the genera Rhus, Ligustrum, Hibiscus, Celastrus, etc. The wax is said to be mainly secreted by the male. It is collected from the plants on which it is deposited, melted and clarified, and made into a very high class of candles used in China. It has been imported in England for the same purpose, but is too expensive for general use. (b) Any member of the genus Ceroplastes. The females secrete much wax, usually deposited on the body in regular plates. C. ceriferus is an Indian wax-scale; C. murice (an old Linnean species) is found at the Cape of Good Hope; C. floridensis is a wax-scale of Florida; C. cirripediformis is the barnacle-scale. (c) A scale of the genus Cerococcus, as C. quercus, which secretes large masses of bright-yellow wax upon the twigs of various oaks, as Quercus undulata, Q. agrifolia, and Q. oblongifolia, in Arizona and California. 2. One of various insects of the family Fulgoroidea, and of one of the genera Phenac, Lystra, and Flatid. In the case of the species of Lystra, the wax is secreted in long white strings from the end of the abdomen. This wax is said to be used in the manufacture of candles in the East Indies and China.

wax-light (waks'lit), n. [= D. waslicht = G. waslicht (cf. leel, carljus, Sw. varljus, Dan. roglus); as *wax*² + *light*¹.] A candle, taper, or night-light made of wax.

The only alternative would have been wax-lights at half a crown a pound. T. A. Trollope, What I Remember.

wax-scot (waks'skot), n. A tax or money payment made by parishioners to supply the church with wax candles.

wax-tree (waks'trē), n. One of several trees, of different localities, the source of some kind of vegetable or insect wax. (a) The Japan wax-tree, specifically Rhus succedanea, a small tree originally from the Loochoo Islands, now extensively planted in Japan, especially on the borders of fields, for its small clustered berries, which yield by expression an excellent candle-wax. The lacquer-tree, Rhus varicifera, yields a still better wax. (b) In China, one of several trees yielding the pela, or white wax (see *wax*²), which incrusts their twigs as the result of the puncture of an insect. One of the most important is a species of privet, Ligustrum lucidum; another is an ash, Fraxinus Chinensis. Ligustrum flota appears to furnish a variety of the same product. (c) A plant of the genus Fissula, which consists of trees and shrubs abounding in a yellow resinous juice. This is collected from some South American species, particularly F. Guianensis, and from its qualities is sometimes called American gamboge. (d) The Colombian varnish-tree, Elaeagnia utilis. (e) The wax-myrtle, Myrica cerifera. [Rare.]

A fragrant shrub, called the Anemiche by the Indians, had attracted the attention of the government. It is the wax-tree, or candle-berry (Myrica cerifera), of which the wax is used for making candles. Gagarré, Hist. Louisiana, l. 520.

wax-weed (waks'wéd), n. An American herb, Cupressus viscosissima, sometimes designated as climmy euphor. It is a branching plant with purple stems covered with extremely viscid hairs; the petals of the small flowers are also purple. The full name is blue wax-weed.

waxwing (waks'wing), n. An oscine passerine bird of the genus Ampelis (or Bombycilla), family Ampelidae: so called because the secondary quills of the wings, and sometimes other feathers of the wings or tail, are tipped with small red horny appendages resembling sealing-wax. There are three species—the Bohemian waxwing or chatterer, A. garrulus, of the northern hemisphere generally, breeding in high latitudes, and migrating southward irregularly, sometimes in flocks of vast extent; the red-winged Japanese waxwing, A. phoenicea; and the smaller Carolina waxwing, cedar-bird, cedar-lark, cherry-bird, etc., of North America, A. cedrorum, the prii chatterer of Latham, 1785. The sealing-wax tips are the enlarged, hardened, and peculiarly modified prolongation of the shaft of the feather, composed of central and peripheral substances differing in the shape of the pigment-cells, which contain abundance of red and yellow coloring matter. Their use is unknown.

waxwork (waks'wérk), n. 1. Work in wax; especially, figures or ornaments made of wax; in ordinary usage, figures, as of real persons, usually of life-size, and more or less of deceptive resemblance, the heads, hands, etc., being in wax, and the rest of the figure so set up and clothed as to increase the imitative effect.

On Wednesday last Mrs. Goldsmith, the famous Woman for Waxwork, brought to Westminster Abbey the Effigies of that celebrated Beauty the late Duchess of Richmond, which is said to be the richest figure that ever was set up in King Henry's Chapel.

2. pl. A place where a collection of such figures is exhibited.—3. The climbing bitter-sweet, Celastrus scandens; so named on account of the waxy scarlet aril of the fruit. See Celastrus and staff-tree. Also called Rosbury wax-work.

waxworker (waks'wér'kér), n. 1. One who works in wax; a maker of waxwork.—2. A bee which makes wax.

wax-worm (waks'wérn), n. The larva of the wax-moth.

waxy¹ (wak'si), a. [*< wax*² + *-y*¹.] 1. Resembling wax or putty in appearance, softness, plasticity, adhesiveness, or other properties; waxen; hence, pliable; yielding; impressionable.

That the softer waxy part of you may receive some impression from this discourse, let us close all with an application. Hammond, Works, III. 626.

Specifically—2. Noting certain complexions. (a) Pallid or blanched; of a translucent pallor, as in bloodlessness. (b) Of a dull, pasty, whitish color, sometimes inclining to the yellowishness of raw beeswax. This is a complexion almost diagnostic of the so-called scrofulous or cancerous diathesis, and of persons in whom the opium habit is confirmed and of long standing.

3. Made of wax; abounding in wax; waxed: as, a waxy dressing for leather.—Waxy degeneration. (a) Same as lardaceous disease (which see, under lardaceous). (b) A change of parts of the muscular fibers into a peculiar hyaline substance, which differs from lardacin; it occurs in certain cases of typhoid fever, meningitis, and other acute febrile disorders.—Waxy liver, kidney, spleen, etc., a liver, kidney, spleen, etc., which has undergone waxy degeneration.

waylay (wā-lā' or wā'lā), v. t. i. pret. and ppr. waylaid, ppr. waylaying. [< way¹ + lay¹; a peculiar formation, expressing a notion not derivable from way + lay taken in their proper sense, and prob. due to confusion with lay wait, lie in wait.] 1. To lie in wait for in the way, in order to lay hold of for some purpose; particularly, to lie in wait for with the view of accosting, seizing, assailing, robbing, or slaying; take in ambush; as, to waylay a traveler.

I will waylay thee going home; where if he be thy chance to kill me . . . thou killest me like a rogue and a villain.

Shak., T. N., iii. 4. 176.

But my Lord St. Albans, and the Queen, and Ambassador Montagu did way lay them at their lodgings, till the difference was made up, to my Lord's honour.

Pepys, Diary, l. 152.

Tuchin, too, who wrote a poem on the death of James II., was waylaid, and so frightfully beaten that he died from its effects.

J. Ashton, Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, II. 64.

wayward (wā'wārd), a. [< ME. weyward, weyward, by aphoresis from awayward, adj., < awayward, adv.; see awayward, and cf. forward.] 1. Full of caprices or whims; froward; perverse.

Bot gif thyn eige be weyward, al thi body shal be derkful.

Wyclif, Mat. vi. 23.

You know my father's wayward, and his humour Must not receive a check.

E. Jonson, Case is Altered, l. 2.

In vain, to soothe his wayward fate,
The cloister oped her pitying gate.

Scott, L. of the L., iii. 6.

2. Irregular; vacillating; unsteady; undulating, or fluctuating; as, the wayward flight of certain birds.

Send its rough wayward roots in all directions.

Smithson, Useful Book for Farmers, p. 32. (Encyc. Dict.)

= Syn. Wayward, Wilful, Contrary, Untoward, headstrong, intractable, unruly. The italicized words tend toward the same meaning by different ways. Wayward, by derivation, applies to one who turns away from what he is desired or expected to be or to do; but, from its seeming derivation, it has come to apply more often to one who turns toward ways that suit himself, whether or not they happen to be what others desire. Wilful suggests that the person is full of self-will, which asserts itself against those whose wishes ought to be deferred to or whose commands should be obeyed. Contrary and unforward express the same idea, the one in a positive, the other in a negative form. Contrary is an energetic word, expressing the idea that one takes, or is disposed to take, the course exactly opposite to that which he is expected or desired to take. Contrariness, when ingrained, becomes perverseness; as, a contrary disposition; a contrary fellow. This use of contrary is by many considered colloquial, but has the recommendation of figurative force. Contrary and unforward view the person as one to be managed; unforward views the person also as the object of mental or moral discipline: this perhaps through its use in Acts ii. 40. An unforward person is not responsive to persuasion, advice, influence, or requests; unforward circumstances are similarly such as do not help us in our plans. All these words imply that the only consistency in the person's conduct is in this self-willed independence of others' wishes or opposition to them, but unforward implies it least. See perverse.

way-warden (wā'wār'dn), n. A keeper or surveyor of roads.

Woodcutler. Had'st best repent and mend thy ways.
Peasant. The way-warden may do that; I wear out no ways; I go across country.

Kingsley, Saint's Tragedy, ii. 6.

waywardly (wā'wārd-lī), adv. In a wayward manner; frowardly; perversely.

waywardness (wā'wārd-nēs), n. [< ME. weicwardness, perverseness; < wayward + -ness.] The character of being wayward; frowardness; perverseness.

The unruly waywardness that infirm and choleric years bring with them.
Shak., Lear, i. 1. 302.

waywise (wā'wīz), a. [< way¹ + wise¹. Cf. way-witty; see also waywiser.] Expert in finding or keeping the way; knowing the way or route. Ash.

waywiser (wā'wīz-ēr), n. [= D. wegwijzer, a guide, = G. wegwiser, a way-mark, guide, = Sw. vägrisare = Dan. vejviser, a guide, a directory; as *way¹ + wiser, shower, indicator, < wise³, point out, show, + -er.] An instrument for measuring the distance which a wheel rolls over a road; an odometer or perambulator.

I went to see Colonel Blount, who showed me the application of the way-wiser to a coach, exactly measuring the miles, and showing them by an index as we went on. It had three circles, one pointing to the number of rods, another to the miles, by 10 to 100, with all the subdivisions of quarters.
Everlyn, Diary, Aug. 6, 1657.

way-witty, a. [ME. weiwitti; < way¹ + witty. Cf. waywise.] Same as waywise.

waywode, waywodship. Same as voivode, voivodship.

wayworn (wā'wörn), a. Wearied or worn by or in traveling.

A way-worn traveller. Longfellow, Hyperion, iii. 2.

waywort (wā'wört), n. The pimpernel, Anagallis arvensis. [Prov. Eng.] wayz-goose, n. [*An erroneous spelling of wase-goose, < wase¹ + goose¹. 1. A stubble-goose; hence, a fat goose—that is, one ready to kill in harvest-time.—2. An entertainment given by an apprentice to his fellow-workmen, of which the goose was the crowning dish; hence, in recent times, a printers' annual dinner, the funds for which are collected by stewards regularly appointed by "the chapel."]

we (wē), pron.; pl. of I. [*Early mod. E. also wee; < ME. we; < AS. wē = OS. wī = OFries. wī = D. wij = OHG. G. wir = Icel. vēr, vēr = Sw. Dan. vi = Goth. weis, < Teut. *wiz, *wis, with appar. nom. suffix -s, prob. = Skt. vāyam, we. The L. and Gr. forms are different; L. nos, pl. (including dual). = Gr. ró, dual; Gr. hūis, we, appar. belonging to the stem of hūi, etc., me (see me).] In AS. wē had a dual, wit, which disappeared in the earliest ME. period. See I 2, *me*¹, our, and us.] I and another or others; I and he or she, or I and they; a personal pronoun, taking the possessive our or ours (see *our*¹) and the objective (dative or accusative) us.*

Go we now on goddess' haine.

William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), i. 2803.

How goes the day with us? O, tell me, Hubert.

Shak., K. John, v. 3. 1.

On the left hand left wee two little Islands,

Sandys, Travails, p. 8.

It may be that the gulfs will wash us down;

It may be we shall touch the Happy Isles,

And see the great Achilles, whom we knew.

Tennyson, Ulysses.

We is sometimes, like they, vaguely used for society, people in general, the world, etc.; but when the speaker or writer uses we he identifies himself more or less directly with the statement; when he uses they he implies no such identification. Both pronouns thus used may be translated by the French on and the German man: as, we (or they) say, French on dit, German man sagt.

Yet seen too oft, familiar with her [vice's] face,

We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

Pope, Essay on Man, ii. 220.

The instances in which our feelings bias us in spite of ourselves are of hourly recurrence.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 196.

Many tongues have a double first person plural, one inclusive and one exclusive of the person or persons addressed: one we which means 'I and my party,' as opposed to you; and one that means 'my party and yours,' as opposed to all third persons.

Whitney, Life and Growth of Lang., p. 219.

We is frequently used by individuals, as editors and authors, when alluding to themselves, in order to avoid the appearance of egotism which it is assumed would result from the frequent use of the pronoun I. The plural style is used also by kings and other potentates, and is said to have been first used in his edicts by King John of England; according to others, by Richard I. The French and German sovereigns followed the example about the beginning of the thirteenth century.

We charge you, on allegiance to ourself,
To hold your slaughtering hands.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., iii. 1. 86.

We and us are sometimes misused for each other.

To poor we Thine enmity's most capital.
Shak., Cor., v. 3. 103.

Nay, no compliment: . . . Shall 'x to dinner, gentlemen?
Dekker and Webster, Northward Ho, ii. 2.

Our bodies themselves, are they simply ours, or are they us?
W. James, Prin. of Psychol., i. 201.

We-us (literally, we ones), we or us. [Dialectal, southern U. S.]

"Grind some fur we-us ter-morrer?" asked Ab. "I'll grind yer bones, ef y'll send 'em down," said Amos.
M. X. Murfree, Prophet of the Great Smoky Mountains, ix.

weabit, n. See way-bit.

weak (wēk), a. [< ME. weik, weyk, waik, wayk. a northern form (< Icel. ceikr, reykr) taking the place of the southern form wake, wac, wake, war, < AS. wac, waac, pliant, weak, easily bent, = *OS. wek = D. wek = MLG. wēk, LG. weak = OHG. weih, MHG. II. trans. To make weak or weaker; lessen or reduce the strength, power, ability, influence, or quality of: as, to weaken the body or the mind; to weaken a solution or infusion by dilution; to weaken the force of an argument.

So strong a Corrosive is Grief of Mind, when it meets with a Body weakened before with Sickness.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 60.

In all these things hath the Kingdome bin of late sore weakened.

Milton, Reformation in Eng., ii.

A languor came Upon him, gentle sickness, gradually

Weakening the man, till he could do no more.

Tennyson, Enoch Arden

weaken (wēk'nér), n. One who or that which weakens.

Fasting and mortifications, . . . rightly managed, are huge helps to piety, [and] great weakeners of sin.
South, Sermons, VI. 11.

weak-eyed (wēk'īd), a. Having weak eyes or weak sight. Callins.

weakfish (wēk'fīsh), n. A sciaenoid fish of the genus Cynoscion (formerly Otolithus), as the squeteague; so called because it has a tender mouth, and cannot pull hard when hooked. The common weakfish or squeteague is C. regalis (see cut under Cynoscion); the white weakfish, C. nebulosus; the spotted weakfish, C. nebulosus. All three are excellent food-fishes; they inhabit the Atlantic coast of the United States, and in southerly regions are misnamed trout or sea-trout.

weak-handed (wēk'hān'ed), a. Having weak hands; hence, powerless; dispirited.

I will come upon him while he is weary and weak-handed.
2 Sam. xvii. 2.

weak-headed (wēk'hēd'ed), a. Having a weak head or intellect.

weak-hearted (wēk'hār'ted), a. Having little courage; dispirited.

I am able now, methinks,
Out of a fortitude of soul I feel,
To endure more miseries and greater far
Than may weak-hearted enemies dare offer.

Shak., Hen. VIII., iii. 2. 390.

weak-hinged (wēk'hīnjēd), a. Ill-balanced; ill-founded. [Rare.]

Not able to produce more accusation Than your own weak-hinged fancy.

weakling (wēk'ling), n. and a. [weak + -ling.] 1. n. A feeble creature.

Weakling, Warwick takes his gift again.
Shak., 3 Henry VI., v. 1. 37.

"Jane is not such a weakling as you would make her," he would say; "she can bear a mountain blast, or a shower, or a few flakes of snow, as well as any of us."
Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xxix.

II. a. Feeble; weak.

This weakling cry of children.

Harper's Mag., LXXXVI. 570.

weakly (wēk'li), a. [ME. ^{wekly} (cf. leel, cacklyr), earlier wælic, wælic, weakly, AS. wælic, weak, vain, mean, vile, AS. wæc, weak; see weak and -ly.] Weak; feeble; not robust; as, a weakly woman; a man of weakly constitution.

Those that are weakly, as Hypochondriacs and Hysterics.

Gideon Harvey, Vanities of Phil. and Physick (ed. 1702), vi.

When I came at the gate that is at the head of the way, the Lord of that place did entertain me freely; neither objected he against my weakly looks.

Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, ii.

weakly (wēk'li), adv. [ME. wæliche, wæliche, AS. wælic, weakly, meanly, vilely, AS. wæc, weak; see weakly.] In a weak manner, in any sense of the word weak.

If a shoemaker should have no shoes in his shop, but only work as he is bespoken, he should be weakly customer.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 219.

weak-minded (wēk'mīn'ded), a. Of a weak mind; of feeble intellect; also, indicating weakness of mind.

The Duke of York . . . prevailed for a time, and fruitlessly endeavoured to bind a weak-minded king by pledges.
J. Bairdner, Richard III., i.

If he should go abroad, his mother might think he had some weak-minded view of joining Julia Ballow, and trying, with however little hope, to win her back.
H. Jones, Tragic Muse, xxxv.

weak-mindedness (wēk'mīn'ded-nes), n. The state or character of being weak-minded; irresolution; indecision.

In benighted maniacal cases there may be melancholy or weak-mindedness from the outset and no maniacal excitement.
Poetastical Rev., N. S., XLIII. 149.

weakness (wēk'nes), n. [ME. wækenes, wækenes, cf. AS. wæcung, weakness, AS. wæc, weak; see weak and -ness.] The state or character of being weak, in any sense; also, a weak point.

SIN wækenes of women may not wile stryve,
Ne have no might toward men naught to fend.

D. Translation of Tring (E. E. T. S.), I. 325.

I think it is the weakness of mine eyes
That shapes this in my vision's apparition.

Shak., J. C., iv. 3. 276.

Weakness is a negative term, and imports the absence of strength. It is, besides, a relative term, and accordingly imports the absence of such a quantity of strength as makes the share possessed by the person in question less than that of some person he is compared to.

B. Nathan, Introduct. to Morals and Legislation, vi. s. note.

It is one of the prime weaknesses of a democracy to be satisfied with the second best if it appear to answer the purpose tolerably well, and to be cheaper, as it never is in the long run.
Lowell, Harvard Anniversary, 1886.

weak-sighted (wēk'sī'ted), a. Having weak sight. A. Tucker.

weak-spirited (wēk'spīr'it-ed), a. Having a weak or timorous spirit; pusillanimous. Scott.

Wealth; riches; hence, prosperity; success; happiness; well-being; the state of being well or prosperous; as, come weal or woe.

Unwise is he that can no wale endure.

Chaucer, Envoy of Chaucer to Bukton, l. 27.

And of this ye seide folk trewe that moche wale and moche woo hate we suffred to-geider.

Melvin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 555.

In our olde vulgare, profite is called wale.

Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, i. 1.

I sing the happy Rusticks wale,
Whose handsum house seems as a Common-weal.

Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 3.

Glad I submit, whoe'er, or young or old,
Ought, more conducive to our wale, unfold.

Pope, Iliad, xiv. 119.

2†. The state; properly in the phrases common weal, public weal, general weal, meaning primarily 'the common or public welfare,' but used (the first now as a compound word) to designate the state (in which weal used alone is an abbreviation of commonweal).

A publike weale is a body hyung, compacte or made of sondry astates and degrees of men, whiche is disposed by the ordre of equite, and governed by the rule and moderation of reason.

Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, i. 1.

The charters that you bear

I the body of the wale. Shak., Cor., ii. 3. 189.

The public, general, or common weal, the interest, well-being, or prosperity of the community, state, or society.

weal¹ (wēl), v. t. [*weal*¹, n.] To promote the weal or welfare of. Fletcher (and another), False One, iv. 3.

weal² (wēl), n. and v. Same as *wale*¹.

weal³, n. Same as *weal*².

weal⁴ (wēl), v. i. [Origin obscure.] To be in woe or want. Hallivell, [Prov. Eng.]

weal-balanced, a. An original misprint, in the following passage, of well-balanced, corrected by some editors, but retained by some, and absurdly explained as "balanced with regard to the common weal or good."

By cold gradation and weal-balanced form
We shall proceed with Angelo.

Shak., M. for M., iv. 3. 104.

Weald (wēld), n. [late ME. weald, appar. an irreg. form of wild (formerly pr. wild), early mod. E. wilde, wylde, found in same sense, confused by later writers with ME. wald, wold, wald, AS. wald, a forest; see *wald*¹. The proper E. form of AS. wald is wald (parallel with bold, fold, hold, sold, told, etc.). The mod. spelling would represents the earlier wald, and has nothing to do with AS. weald, unless it is due to Verstegan, who affected the "restitution" of old forms.] 1. The name given in England to an oval-shaped area, bounded by a line topographically well marked by an escarpment of the Chalk, which begins at Folkestone Hill, near the Straits of Dover, and passes through the counties of Kent, Surrey, Hants, and Sussex, meeting the sea again at Beachy Head. It embraces the southwestern part of Kent, the southern part of Surrey, the north and northeastern half of Sussex, and a small part of the eastern side of Hampshire. These are the limits of the area now known to geologists as the Weald; but, according to the English Geological Survey, it is probable that the area anciently designated by that name was somewhat smaller than this, having been bounded by the escarpment of the Lower Greensand, which is approximately concentric with that of the Chalk, but inside and distant from five to ten miles from it. This latter escarpment is, however, in places rather ill-defined, so that there the boundary of the ancient Weald was doubtful. The geology of the Weald is extremely interesting, hence the name has become very familiar. The formations covering the Weald proper are known as the Wealden (which see). The Weald was originally partly covered with forests and partly destitute of them.

The historic of this Hoghead, presenteth to my minde an opinion, that some men mainteine touching this Weald: nothing els but it was a great while together in manner nothing els but a desert, and waste Wildernesse, not planted with Townes, or peopled with men, as the outsidis of the shyre were, but stored and stuffed with heards of Deere, and droves of Hogs only. Which conceit, though happily it may seem to many but a Paradoxe, yet in mine owne fantasie, it wanteth not the feete of sound reason to stand upon.

Lambard, A Perambulation of Kent (1596), p. 211.

We know that the Weald proper, or that part of the country below the Lower Greensand escarpment, was the part latest cultivated. Even as late as Elizabeth's time swine are said to have run wild here.

Topley, Geol. of the Weald, p. 398.

2. [l. c.] Any open country. [Rare, and mostly in poetry.]

But ste to Almesbury
Fled all night long by glimmering waste and weald.
Tennyson, Guinevere.

Wealden (wēld'n), n. and n. [Irreg. cf. Weald + -en.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Weald.

II. n. In geol., the name of a formation extensively developed in the Weald of England (see Weald), and interesting from its position and organic remains. Its geological age is Lower Cretaceous. The deposits of the Wealden, which have a total thickness of 1,800 feet, precisely resemble those of a modern delta, and the organic remains include land-plants, fresh-water shells, and a few estuarine or marine forms, as also dinosaurs, plesiosaurs, and pterodactyls. The Wealden is separated into two divisions: the Weald Clay, at the top, about 1,000 feet thick, and the Hastings Sand group beneath, which is subdivided, in descending order, as follows: Tunbridge Wells Sand, 120 to 180 feet thick; Wadhurst Clay, 120 to 180 feet; and Ashdown Sand, 400 to 500 feet. The Wealden is overlain conformably by the Lower Greensand.

wealdish (wēld'ish), a. [cf. Weald, the Weald, + -ish.] Of or belonging to a weald, especially [cap.] to the Weald of Kent, Surrey, and Sussex.

The Wealdish men. Fuller, Worthies, Kent, II. 111.

wealfult (wēl'fūl), a. [ME. weful, weoleful; *weal*¹ + -ful.] Successful; prosperous; happy; joyous; felicitous.

For thow ne wost what is the ende of thinges, forthy domestow that felonos and wykked men ben myhty and weleful.
Chaucer, Boethius, i. prose 6.

To tell the jerkes with joy that joy do bring
Is both a wealfull and a wofull thing.

Darvies, Holy Roode, p. 13. (Darvies.)

wealfulness (wēl'fūl-nes), n. [ME. welefulnesse; wealful + -ness.] Prosperity; success; happiness.

In his opinioun of felicity, that I clepe welefulnesse.

Chaucer, Boethius, i. prose 3.

weal-public (wēl'pub'lik), n. The state; the commonwealth; the body politic; the public weal; properly two words, like body politic.

If you can find in your heart so to appoint and dispose yourself that you may apply your wit and diligence to the profit of the weal-public.

Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), i.

What is all this, either here or there, to the temporal regimen of Wealpublic, whether it be Popular, Princely, or Monarchical?

Milton, Reformation in Eng., ii.

weals-man (wēlz'mān), n. [weal's, poss. of weal, + -man.] A statesman.

Meeting two such wealsmen as you are—I cannot call you Lyeurgises—if the drink you give me touch my palate adversely, I make a crooked face at it.

Shak., Cor., ii. 1. 59.

wealth (welth), n. [ME. welthe, welthe = MD. welde, D. weelde = MLG. wêld, LG. weelde = OHG. welida, welitha, wealth; as *weal*² + -th. CF. health, dearth, etc.] 1†. Weal; prosperity; well-being; happiness; joy.

For I am fallen into helle
From paradys and welthe.

Rom. of the Rose, l. 4137.

I shall go to my fadir that I come froo,
And dwell with hym wylny in alle the way.

York Plays, p. 265.

Let no man seek his own, but every man another's wealth (but each his neighbour's good, E. V.). 1 Cor. x. 24.

Grant her in health and wealth long to live.

Book of Common Prayer [Eng.], Prayer for the Queen.

2. Riches; valuable material possessions; that which serves, or the aggregate of those things which serve, a useful or desired purpose, and cannot be acquired without a sacrifice of labor, capital, or time; especially, large possessions; abundance of worldly estate; affluence; opulence.

It shall then be given out that I'm a gentlewoman of such a birth, such a wealth, have had such a breeding, and so forth.

Dekker and Webster, Northward Ho, l. 2.

Get place and wealth—if possible, with grace;

If not, by any means, get wealth and place.

Pope, Imit. of Horace, I. i. 103.

Wealth, in all commercial states, is found to accumulate.

Goldsmith, Vicar, xix.

Things for which nothing could be obtained in exchange, however useful or necessary they may be, are not wealth in the sense in which the term is used in Political Economy.

J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ., Prelim. Rem.

Senior, again, has admirably defined wealth, or objects possessing value, as "those things, and those things only, which are transferable, are limited in supply, and are directly or indirectly productive of pleasure or preventive of pain."

Jerome, The Theory of Polit. Econ., p. 175.

3. Affluence; profusion; abundance.

Again the feast, the speech, the glee,
The shade of passing thought, the wealth
Of words and wit.

Tennyson, In Memoriam, Conclusion.

Active wealth. See active capital, under active. = Syn. 2. Affluence, Riches, etc. See opulence.

wealthful (welth'fūl), a. [< wealth + -ful.] Full of wealth or happiness; prosperous. Sir T. More.

wealthfully (welth'fūl-i), adv. In prosperity or happiness; prosperously.

To lead thy life wealthfully.

Vires, Instruction of a Christian Woman, ii. 2.

wealthily (wel'thi-li), adv. In a wealthy manner; in the midst of wealth; richly.

I come to wive it wealthily in Padua;

If wealthily, then happily in Padua;

Shak., T. of the S., i. 2. 75.

wealthiness (wel'thi-nēs), n. [Early mod. E. welthiness; < wealthy + -ness.] The state of being wealthy; wealth.

The Fosterer vp of shooting is Labour, companion of virtue, the maynteyner of honestie, the encreaser of health and welthiness. Ascham, Toxophilus (ed. Arber), p. 52.

It is a more sound wealthiness for a man to esteeme him selfe wise than to presume to be of great wealth; for with wisdom they obtaine to haue, but with haueing they come to lose themselves.

Guicciardini, Letters (tr. by Hellowes, 1577), p. 191.

wealthy (wel'thi), a. [Early mod. E. welthy, welthe; < wealth + -y.] 1. Having wealth; rich; having large possessions; opulent; affluent.

Married to a wealthy widow.

Shak., T. of the S., iv. 2. 37.

2. Rich in any sense, as in beauty, ornament, endowments, etc.; enriched.

Thou broughtest us out into a wealthy place.

Ps. lxxvi. 12.

Her dowry wealthy.

Shak., T. of the S., iv. 5. 65.

'Twas a tough Task, believe it, thus to tame
A wild and wealthy Language, and to frame Grammatic Toils to curb her, so that she Now speaks by Rules, and sings by Prosody.

Hocell, Letters, I. v. 26.

Revealings deep and clear are thine
Of wealthy smiles.

Tennyson, Madeline.

3. Well-fed; in good condition. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.] = Syn. 1. Moneyed, well off, well to do.

weamt, n. An obsolete form of wean.

wean (wēn), v. t. [Formerly also wain; < ME. wēnen, < AS. wēnian (ge-wēnian, accustom, also wean, ā-wēnian, wean) = D. wennen, accustom (ge-wennen, accustom, inure, af-wennen, wean), = OHG. wēnian, wennan, wēnen, MHG. wēnen, accustom (OHG. weaponry (wep'on-ri), n. [< weapon + -ry (see -ry)] Weapons in general. [Rare.] weapon-salve (wep'on-säv), n. A salve which was supposed to cure a wound by being applied to the weapon that made it. According to Sir Kenelm Digby, the salve produces sympathy between the wound and the weapon; he cites several instances to prove that "as the sword is treated the wound inflicted by it feels. Thus, if the instrument is kept wet, the wound will feel cool; if held to the fire, it will feel hot," etc. This superstition is referred to in the following lines:

She has ta'en the broken lance,

And washed it from the clotted gore,

And salved the splinter o'er and o'er.

Scott, L. of L. M., iii. 23.

weapon-smith (wep'on-smith), n. One who makes weapons of war; an armorer. [Rare.]

It is unavoidable that the first mechanics—beyond the heretical weapon-smith on the one hand, and on the other the poor professors of such rude arts as the homestead cannot do without— . . . should be those who have no land.

Few portions of Spanish literature show anything more stiff and wearisome than the long declamations and discussions in this dull fiction.

Ticknor, Span. Lit., III. 88.

= Syn. Wearisome, Fatiguing, Tiresome, Tedious, Irksome, prolix, humdrum, prosy, dull. Wearisome and fatiguing are essentially the same in meaning and strength; they are equally appropriate whether the person acted or is acted upon: as, the old man was so deaf that it was equally wearisome (or fatiguing) to speak and to be spoken to. Tiresome is more often used where one is acted upon; in strength it is the same as wearisome. Tedious is stronger than wearisome, and suggests the need of constant effort of the will to do or to endure; the weariness may be physical or mental: as, a tedious task; a tedious headache; tedious garrulity. Tedious suggests commonly that one is acted upon; irksome suggests that one acts or is called upon to act, and implies also a peculiar reluctance. In Shak., 2 Hen. VI., ii. 1. 56, is an example of the rarer use of irksome to express a wearied shrinking from being acted upon: "How irksome is this music to my heart!" See fatigue, n., and tire, v.

wearisomely (wēr'i-sum-lī), adv. In a wearisome manner; tediously; so as to cause weariness.

Tired; exhausted by toil or exertion; having the endurance or patience worn out by continuous striving.

There here is the place where that our Lord rested him, when he was wery for berynge of the Cros.

Mauderle, Travels, p. 80.

Estern tewysday to Suza to Diner, and the I rest me; for I was were, and my hors also, for the grett labor that I had the same mornyn in passing over the eyvll and grevows mounte Sene.

Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 3.

Let us not be wery in well doing.

Gal. vi. 9.

When they will they work, and sleep when they are wery.

Sandys, Travels, p. 14.

I see you are wery, and therefore I will presently wait on you to your chamber.

Cotton, in Walton's Angler, ii. 235.

The stag-hounds, wery with the chase,
Lay stretched upon the rushy floor.

Scott, L. of L. M., i. 2.

2. Impatient of or discontented with the continuance of something painful, exacting, irksome, or distasteful, and willing to be done with it; having ceased to feel pleasure (in something).

In the exercise and study of the mind they be never wery.

Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), ii. 7.

Wery of the world, away she lies,
And yokes her silver doves.

Shak., Venus and Adonis, 1. 1189.

I think she is wery of your tyranny,
And therefore gone.

Fluteher, Pilgrim, ii. 1.

He is wery of the old wooden houses, the mud and dust, the dead level of site and sentiment, the chill east wind, and the chilliest of social atmospheres.

Hawthorne, Scarlet Letter, Int., p. 11.

3. Causing fatigue; tiresome; irksome: as, a wery journey; a wery life.

How wery, stale, flat, and unprofitable Seem to me all the uses of this world!

Shak., Hamlet, i. 2. 133.

Their dusty palfreys and array Showed they had marched a wery way.

Scott, Marion, i. 8.

Most wery seem'd the sea, wery the oar,
Wery the wandering fields of barren foam.

Tennyson, Lotus-Eaters.

4. Feeble; sickly; puny. Forby; Jamieson. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.] = Syn. Disgusted, wearisome. See *wary*¹, v.

weary¹ (wēr'i), v. pret. and pp. wearied, ppr. wearying. [< ME. werien, < AS. wērigean, ge-wērigean, weary, fatigued, < wērig, weary; see *wary*¹, a.] 1. trans. 1. To make weary; reduce or exhaust the physical strength or endurance of; fatigued; tire: as, to wery one's self with striving.

The people shall wery themselves for very vanity.

Hab. ii. 13.

They in the practice of their religion wearied chiefly their knees and hands, we especially our ears and tongues.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 81.

2. To exhaust the endurance, patience, or resistance of, as by persistence or importunity.

I stay too long by thee, I wery thee.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 5. 94.

I have even wearied heaven with prayers.

Ford, 'Tis Pity, 1. 3.

Watchful I'll guard thee, and with Midnight Pray'r Wery the Gods to keep thee in their Care.

Prior, Henry and Emma.

To wery out. (a) To exhaust or subdue by something fatiguing or irksome.

Like an Egyptian Tyrant, some Thou weariest out in building but a Tomb.

Cowley, The Mistress, Thralldom.

She surceased not, day nor night,

To storm me over-watch'd and wearied out.

Milton, S. A., 1. 106.

(b) To pass wearily. [Rare.]

The land of Italy:

There will I waille, and wery out my dayes in wo.

The Merchant's Daughter (Child's Ballads, IV. 320).

= Syn. 1. Fatigue, Jade, etc. See tire.

II. intrans. 1. To become weary, tired, or fatigued.

She was nae ten miles frae the town,

When she began to wery.

Lizae Brattle (Child's Ballads, IV. 74).

2. To become impatient or surfeited, as with the continuance of something that is monotonous, irksome, or distasteful.

Sing the simple passage o'er and o'er

For all an April morning, till the ear

Wearies to hear it.

Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

3. To long; languish: with for before the object.

The pair took home schoolboy meals in paper-bags, subsisting upon buns and canned meats, and wearying for the taste of a hot broiled steak. The Century, XXXVII. 775.

weary² (wēr'i), n. [*< *weary*², v., var. of *wary*², curse: see *wary*².] A curse: used now only in the phrases Wery fa' you! Wery on you! and the like. Scott. [Scotch.] weasand (wē'zand), n. [Also weazand, and formerly weasnd, weasnd, also dial. wēzen, wizen, wizen, and wosen: < ME. weasnd, weasnde, weasande, weasande, weasant, < AS. wāsend, also wāsend (> E. dial. wosen) = OFries. wāsende, wāsende, weasand, windpipe; = OHG. wēisunt, MHG. wēisunt (E. Müller), weasand; cf. G. dial. (Bav.) waisel, wasel, wasing, the gullet of ruminating animals. The word (AS. wāsend) has the form of a present participle, and some have attempted to connect it with wheeze; this involves the assumption that the rare AS. verb hwēsan (pret. hwās), wheeze, = Icel. hræsa, hiss, = Dan. hræse, hiss, wheeze (not found in OHG., etc.), gave rise to a noun hwēsend*, varying to hwēsend*, hwāsend*, meaning 'the wheezing thing,' that this name was applied to all windpipes (most of which never wheeze), and that subsequently the initial consonant in hw- fell away, a phenomenon wholly unknown in other AS. words in hw-, and not recognized even in mod. English except in dialectal use.] The windpipe; the pipe or tube through which air passes to and from the lungs in respiration; the trachea. See *trachea*¹ and larynx.

Should I have named him? Nay, they should as soon have this weasand of mine.

Lattuer, 2d Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1550.

Had his weasnd bene a little wider.

Spenser, Shep. Cal., September.

Give me a razor there, that I may scrape his weasnd, that the bristles may not hinder me when I come to cut it.

Dryden, The Mock Astrologer, V. i.

You may have a pot of porter, or two—but neither wine nor spirits shall wet your weasnd this night, Tickler.

Noctes Ambrosianae, Feb., 1832.

wease-allan (wēz'al'an), n. See wease-allen.

weasel (wē'z), n. [Formerly also weazel, weasel; < ME. wēsel, wesele, wesle, wesle, < AS. wesele = D. wesel, wesle (dim. wesleke, weseltje) = OHG. wisala, MHG. wisel, wisale, G. wiesel = Icel. visla (in comp. hrysi-visla) = Sw. visla, vissla = Dan. væsel, a weasel; origin uncertain.] 1. A small carnivorous digitigrade mammal of the restricted genus Putorius, of the family Mustelidae, related to the stoat or ermine, ferret, and polecat of the same genus, and less intimately to the marten or sable of the genus Mustela of the same family. The species to which the name is most frequently or especially applied is P. vulgaris, the common weasel of Europe and of most of the cold and temperate parts of the northern hemisphere, distinguished by the comparative length and extreme slenderness of the body, and very small size, being only some four or five inches long, with a tail of 2 inches in length, or less; the color is reddish-brown above, and white below; the tail is of the same color as the body, and not tipped with black. In northerly regions it turns white in winter, like the ermine. It feeds on rats, mice, moles, shrews, small birds and their eggs, and insects; and, though itself classed as vermin by gamekeepers, it is often serviceable as a destroyer of vermin in ricks, barns, and granaries, its small size and lithe, sinuous body enabling it to penetrate almost everywhere. Its cunning and wariness are proverbial in the expression to catch a weasel asleep—that is, to do an extremely difficult thing by strategy, finesse, or unexpected action. Other species of Putorius, properly called weasels, inhabit most parts of the world, and the name has loosely attached to various animals of different families, some of which applications are noted in phrases below.

Common Weasel (Putorius vulgaris).

Fair was this yonge wyf, and therewithal

As any wezele hir body gent and smal.

Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 48.

A wezel tame have smn men ther thai crepe,

Hem forto take.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. 8.), p. 102.

I can suck melancholy out of a song as a weasel sucks eggs.

Shak., As you like it, ii. 5. 13.

2†. The weasel-coot.—3. A lean, mean, sneaking, greedy fellow.

The weasel Scot

Comes sneaking, and so sucks her pinnely eggs.

Shak., Hen. V., i. 2. 170.

Four-toed weasel, the African zenik or suricate, a viverrine, formerly Khryzina tetradactyla. See cut under suricate.—Malacca weasel. Same as rassel. See cut under Fiveriver.—Mexican weasel. Same as kinkajou (which see, with cut).—Pouched weasel. See pouched, and cut under Phascogale.

weasel-cat (wē'zī-kat), n. The linsang, Prionodon gracilis. See cut under delandul.

weasel-coot (wē'zī-kōt), n. The so-called red-headed snew. This is the female or young male of Mergellus albellus (the adult male of which is figured under snew). The implication of the term weasel appears to be the mustelid or fox color of the head. An old name of this or a similar mercanser was Mergus mustelinus, and one used by Sir T. Browne was Mustela variegata. The same adjective with the same meaning occurs in Turdus mustelinus, the present name of the wood-thrush of the United States, and in several other specific designations of animals, as in Lepilemur mustelinus, the weasel-lemur. Compare weaser.

weasel-duck (wē'zī-duk), n. Same as weasel-coot.

weasel-faced (wē'zī-fāst), a. Having a thin, sharp face like a weasel's. Steele.

weasel-fish (wē'zī-fish), n. The three-bearded rockling, or whistle-fish. See whistle-fish.

weasel-lemur (wē'zī-lēm), n. A small lemur, Lepilemur mustelinus.

weaselling, n. [Also weazelling; < weasel + ling.] A kind of rockling, probably the five-bearded, Matella mustela.

weaselmonger (wē'zī-mung'gôr), n. A rat-catcher; one who hunts rats, etc., with weasels.

This weaselmonger, who is no better than a cat in a house, or a ferret in a conyag [rabbit-burrow].

Peele, Speeches to Queen Elizabeth at Theobalds, in.

weasel-snout (wē'zī-snout), n. The yellow dead-nettle, Lamium Galeobdolon; so called from the shape of the corolla. See Galeobdolon.

weasel-spider (wē'zī-spī'der), n. A book-name of any arachnid of the family Galeodidae. See cut under Solpugida.

weaser (wē'zēr), n. [Cf. weasel-coot.] The American morgananser or sheldrake, Mergus americanus. J. P. Giraud, 1844; G. Trumbull, 1888. Also weaser and weezer. [Long Island.]

weasiness (wē'zī-nēs), n. The state or condition of being weasy.

weasy[†] (wē'zī), a. [Appar. for weasy*, a dial. var. of woosy, an earlier form of wozy (like weese, woose, for ooze).] Gluttonous; sensual. Joye.

weather (wēth'ēr), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also wether: with alteration of orig. d to th (as also in father, mother, prob. under Scandinavian influence; cf. Icel. veðr), < ME. wader, wedir, < AS. wader, weather, wind, = OS. wedar, weder = OFries. weder = D. weder, contracted wer = OHG. wetar, MHG. weter, G. wetter (cf. also G. ge-witter, a storm) = Icel. veðr = Sw. vader, wind, air, weather, = Dan. veer, weather, wind, air (not found in Goth.). What gusts of weather from that gathering cloud My thoughts presage! Dryden, Æneid, v. 19.

24. Cold and wet.

Seynge this bysshop with his company sytting in the *weath*er, desyred hym to his howse. Fabian, Chron., lxxxiii.
And, it two Boote keep out the Weather?
What need you have two Hides of Leather?
Prior, Alma, iii.

34. A light rain; a shower. Wyclif, Deut. xxxii. 2.—4. The state of the air or atmosphere with respect to its cloudiness, humidity, motions, pressure, temperature, electrical condition, or any other meteorological phenomena; the atmospheric conditions prevailing at any moment over any region of the earth: as, warm or cold weather; wet or dry weather; calm or stormy weather; fair or foul weather; cloudy or hazy weather. The investigation of the various causes which determine the state of the atmosphere and produce the changes which are incessantly taking place in its condition forms the subject of meteorology. The average condition of the weather for a considerable period constitutes climate, and the statistical compilation of meteorological observations forms the basis of climatology.

Men may see the Wallies when it is fayr *Weathe*re and cleer.
Manderly, Travels, p. 101.

A! lorde, what the *weath*er is colde!
The icellest freeze that euer I felyd.
York Plays, p. 114.

They . . . wolde ride in the cole of the mornyng that was feire and stille and asofte *weath*er, and thei were yonge and tender to suttre grete trauayle.

Martin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 191.

Gentlewomen, the *weath*er's hot; whither walk you?
E. Jenson, Bartholomew Fair, iii. 1.

Horrible weather again to-day, snowing and raining all day.
Sidney Smith, To Mrs. Sydney Smith.

5. Specifically, in weather-maps and -reports, the condition of the sky as to cloudiness and the occurrence of precipitation.—6. Change of the state of the atmosphere; meteorological change; hence, figuratively, vicissitude; change of fortune or condition.

It is a reuerend thing to see an ancient castle . . . not in decay; how much more to behold an ancient noble family which hath stood against the waves and weathers of time!

But my substantial Love
Of a more firm and perfect Nature is;
No Weathers can it move,
Cowley, The Mistress, Coldness.

7. The inclination or obliquity of the sails of a windmill to the plane of revolution.—Angle of weather. See weather. Clerk of the weather. See clerk. Merry weather. See merry.—Soft weather.
(a) A thaw. [New Eng.] (b) An enervating atmosphere.
—To make fair weather, to conciliate or flatter, as by fair words and shows of friendship.

I must *make fair weath*er yet awhile.
Till Henry be more weak and I more strong.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., v. 1. 30.

To make good or bad weather (weath). See make.— Under the weather, indisposed; ill; ailing; a condition caused or influenced by the state of the weather. [Colloq.]

Since I went to Washington, and until within ten days, I have been quite under the weather, and I have had to neglect everything. S. Bowler, in Merriam, II. 49.

Weather Bureau, a bureau of the Department of Agriculture, having charge of the forecasting of weather, the issue of storm-warnings, the display of weather- and flood-signals, the gaging and reporting of rivers, the maintenance of sea-coast telegraph-lines, the collection and transmission of marine intelligence for the benefit of commerce and navigation, the taking of meteorological observations for establishing the climatic conditions of the United States, and the distribution of meteorological information. From 1871 to 1891 these duties were performed by the 2d service of the army, which during that period was popularly called the Weather Bureau.—Weather- signal. See signal.

II. a. Naut., toward the wind; windward; opposed to lee: as, weather bow; weather beam; weather light. Weather anchor, the anchor, lying to weather (i. e., which a ship rides when moored).
Weather helm, quarter, tide. See the nouns.

weather (weTH'ér), v. t. [ME. weðeran, < AS. weðrian, weðrian, expose to the air, indicate the weather; cf. AS. weðrian = Sw. veðra, expose to the air, air, scent, smell, sniff the air; = Dan. veðre, air, scent; from the noun.] I. trans. 1. To air; expose to the air; dry or otherwise affect by exposure to the open air. [Rare.]

I fear me this land is not yet ripe to be ploughed, for,
as the saying is, it lacketh weather.

Edmund Spenser, The Plough

And then he pearceth on some beech thereby,
To weather him, and his moist wings to dry.
Spenser, Monopetines, l. 184

All barleys that have been weathered in the field, or have got mow-burnt or musty in the stack, should be rigidly rejected. Ure, Dict., III. 185.

Hawks are weathered by being placed unhooded in the open air. This term is applied to passage hawks which are not sufficiently reclaimed to be left out by themselves unhooded on blocks—they are weathered by being put out for an hour or two under the falconer's eye.

Eugene, Brit., IX. 7.

2. To affect injuriously by the action of weather:
in geol., to discolor or disintegrate: as, the atmospheric agencies that weather rocks.

—3. In tile-making, to expose (the clay) to a hot sun or to frost, in order to open the pores and separate the particles, that it may readily absorb water and be easily worked.—4. To slope
(a surface), that it may shed water.—5. Naut.:
(a) To sail to windward of: as, to weather a point or cape.

We weathered Pulo Pare on the 29th, and stood in for the main. Cook, First Voyage, iii. 13.

(b) To bear up against and come safely through:
said of a ship in a storm, as also of a mariner;
hence, used in the same sense with reference to storms on land.

Here's to the pilot that weathered the storm. Cunning.

Among these hills, from first to last,
We've weathered many a furious blast.
Wordsworth, The Waggoner, ii.

I weathered some weary snow-storms.

Thoreau, Walden, p. 275.

To sell the boat — and yet he loved her well;
How many a rough sea had he weathered in her!
Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

6. Figuratively, to bear up against and overcome, as trouble or danger; come out of, as a trial, without permanent damage or loss.

You will weather the difficulties yet. E. W. Robertson.

The vitality and self-direction of the semi Greek municipalities of the East in large measure weathered Roman rule, as did also the Greek speech and partially Hellenized life of Asia, Syria, and Egypt. W. Wilson, State, § 143.

To weather a point, to gain an advantage or accomplish a purpose against opposition.—To weather out, to hold out against to the end.

When we have pass'd these gloomy hours,
And weathered out the storm that beats upon us.
Addison, Cato, iii. 2.

II. intrans. 1. To suffer a change, such as discoloration or more or less complete disintegration, in consequence of exposure to the weather- or atmosphere. See weathering, 2.

The lowest bed is a sandstone with ferruginous veins;
it weathers into an extraordinary honey-combed mass.
Darwin, Geol. Observations, ii. 426.

The granite commenced to weather, and weathered mercifully on in spite of all technical and scientific commissions. Science, VII. 75.

2. To resist or bear exposure to the weather.

For outside work, boiled oil is used, because it weathers better than raw oil. Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 436.

weather-beaten (weTH'ér-bē'tn), a. [< weather + beaten. In some of its uses perhaps a perverted spelling of weather-bitten, q. v.] Beaten or marred by the weather; seasoned or hardened by exposure to all kinds of weather: as, a weather-beaten sailor.

She enjoys sure peace for evermore,
As weather-beaten ship arry'd on happier shore.
Spenser, F. Q., II. i. 2.

Summer being ended, all things stand in appearance with a weather-beaten face.

extra turn of (a cable) about the bits or the end of the windlass in bad weather.

weather-bitten (weTH'ér-bit), n. [= Sw. veðer-biten = Norw. vederbitten = Dan. veirbitt, weather-bitten; as weather + bitten. Cf. Norw. vederslitten, weather-slit, weather-worn. Cf.
weather-beaten.] Worn, marred, or defaced by exposure to the weather.

The old shepherd . . . stands by, like a weather-bitten condit of many kings' reigns. Shak., W. T., v. 2. 60.

weather-blown (weTH'ér-blōn), a. Weather-beaten; weather-stained. Chapman, Iliad, ii. 532.

weather-board (weTH'ér-bōrd), n. [= lecl. vetherbord, the windward side; as weather + board.] 1. Naut.: (a) That side of a ship which is toward the wind; the windward side.
(b) A piece of plank placed in a ship's port when she is laid up in ordinary, inclined so as to turn off rain without preventing the circulation of air.—2. A board used in weather-boarding.
weather-board (weTH'ér-bōrd), v. t. [< weather-board, n.] To nail boards upon, as a roof or wall, lapping one over another, in order to turn off rain, snow, etc.

It was a building of four rooms, constructed of hewn logs and weather-boarded at the joints.

The Century, XXXVIII. 408.

weather-boarding (weTH'ér-bōr'ding), n. 1. A facing of thin boards, having usually a feather-edge, and nailed lapping one over another, used as an outside covering for the walls of a wooden building. They are practically the same as clapboards, but are distinguished from those by being larger and wider.—2. The finish or woodwork at the base of a clapboarded wall.—3. The whole exterior covering of a wall or roof, whether of weather-boards, clapboards, or shingles.—Weather-boarding clamp, gauge, saw, etc., special forms of clamp, gauge, saw, etc., used in applying or cutting out weather-boarding.

weather-bound (weTH'ér-bound), a. Delayed by bad weather.

weather-box (weTH'ér-bōks), n. A form of hygroscope, in the shape of a toy-house, which roughly indicates weather changes by the appearance or retirement of toy images. In a common form a man advances from his porch in wet and a woman in dry weather—the movement being produced by the varying torsion of a hygroscopic string by which the images are attached. Also called weather-house.

The elder and younger son of the house of Crawley were, like the gentleman and lady in the weather-box, never at home together. Thackeray, Vanity Fair, x.

weather-breeder (weTH'ér-brē'dēr), n. A fine serene day which precedes and prepares a storm.

"It's a beautiful day," said Whittaker. . . . "Yes, nice day," growled Adams, "but a weather-breeder."
E. Eggleston, Roxy, xiii.

weather-cast (weTH'ér-kāst), n. A forecast of the weather. [Rare.]

Admiral FitzRoy, in 1860, was enabled, aided by the electric telegraph, to inaugurate a system of storm-warnings and weather-casts.

R. Strachan, in Modern Meteorology, p. 84.

weather-caster (weTH'ér-kās'tēr), n. One who computes the weather for almanacs. Hallirvell.

weather-cloth (weTH'ér-klōth), n. Naut.: (a)
A covering of painted canvas for hammocks, boats, etc. (b) A tarpaulin placed in the weather- rigging to make a shelter for officers and men on watch.

weathercock (weTH'ér-kok), n. [< ME. wedercok, wedyroke, weddyroke, wedercoe, so called because the figure of a cock, as an emblem of vigilance, has from a very early time been a favorite form for vanes; cf. D. weerhaan = Sw. väderhane = Dan. veirhane, a weathercock, etc.
(D. haan, etc., a cock).] 1. A vane or weather-vane; a pointing device, set on the top of a spire or other elevation, and turning with the wind, thus showing its direction. See cut under vane.

O jest unseen, inscrutable, invisible,
As a nose on a man's face, or a weather-cock on a steeple!
Shak., T. G. of V., ii. 1. 142.

They are Men whose Conditions are subject to more Revolutions than a Weather Cock, or the Uncertain Mind of a Fantastical Woman. Ward, London Spy.

His head . . . looked like a weather-cock, perched upon his spindle neck to tell which way the wind blew.
Iring, Sketch-Book, p. 420.

2. Figuratively, any thing or person that is easily and frequently turned or swayed; a fickle or inconstant person.

What pretty weathercocks these women are!

Randolph, Anytas, i. 1.

The word which I have given shall stand like fate,
Not like the king's, that weather-cock of state.
Dryden, Conquest of Granada, I, iii. 1.

weathercock (weTH'ér-kok), v. t. [< weathercock, n.] To serve as a weathercock to or on.
[Rare.]

Whose blazing wyvern weathercock'd the spire.
Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

weather-contact (weTH'ér-kon'takt), n. In teleg., leakage to neighboring wires or to earth, due to wet insulators.

weather-cross (weTH'ér-krōs), n. In telegraph-and telephone-lines, a leakage from one line to another, caused by poor insulation, and brought about by wet or stormy weather.

weather-dog (weTH'ér-dog), n. A fragmentary rainbow, popularly believed, especially in Cornwall, to be an indication of rain. [Prov. Eng.]

weather-driven (weTH'ér-driv'n), a. [= Sw. vä-der-drifven, wind-driven; as weather + driven.] Driven by winds or storms; forced by stress of weather.

weathered (weTH'ér-d), p. a. 1. Discolored or disintegrated by the action of the elements:

said sometimes of surfaces of wood, but oftener of stones or rocks. Trees which show signs of having suffered from exposure to the weather, as many old ones do, are sometimes said to be weather-beaten, but rarely, if ever, to be weathered. See weathering, 2.

The bands of stratification . . . can be distinguished in many places, especially in Navarin Island, but only on the weathered surfaces of the slate.

Darwin, Geol. Observations, ii. 418.

The force of the wind is such as actually to loosen the weathered parts of the rock and dislodge them.

Gekie, Geol. Sketches, ii.

2. Seasoned by exposure to the air or the weather.—3. In arch., having a slope or inclination to prevent the lodgment of water: noting surfaces approximately or theoretically horizontal, as those of window-sills, the tops of cornices, and the upper surface of flat stone-work.

weather-eye (weθ'ér-í), n. The eye imagined to be specially used for the purpose of observing the sky in order to forecast the weather.—To keep one's weather-eye open or awake, to be on one's guard; have one's wits about one. [Colloq.]

Keep your weather eye awake, and don't make any more acquaintances, however handsome.

Dickens, Our Mutual Friend, ii. 5.

weather-fend (weθ'ér-fend), v. t. [< weather + fend]. To shelter; defend from the weather. [Rare.]

The line grove which weather-fends your cell.

Shak., Tempest, v. 1. 10.

weather-fish (weθ'ér-fish), n. The mud-fish, thunder-fish, or misgurn of Europe, Misgurnus fossilis; regarded as a weather-prophet because it is supposed to come out of the mud, in which it habitually burrows, before a storm.

weather-gage (weθ'ér-gáj), n. 1. Naut., the advantage of the wind; the position of a ship when she is to windward of another ship: opposed to lee-gage.

A ship is said to have the weather-gage of another when she is to the windward of her.

Admiral Smyth.

Hence—2. Advantage of position; the upper hand.

Were the line
Of Rokeby once combined with mine,
I gain the weather-gage of fate!

Scott, Rokeby, vi. 24.

To dispute the weather-gage. See dispute.

weather-gall (weθ'ér-gal), n. Same as water-gall, 2.

weather-glass (weθ'ér-glás), n. [= D. weer-glas = Sw. räderglas = Dan. veirglas, barometer; as weather + glass.] An instrument designed to indicate the state of the atmosphere. This word is commonly applied to the barometer, but also to other instruments for measuring atmospheric changes and indicating the state of the weather, as the thermometer and various kinds of hygrometers.

The King of Spain's health is the Weather-glass upon which all our politicians look; as that rises or falls, we look pleasant or uneasy.

Prior (Ellis's Lit. Letters, p. 265).

Shepherd's or poor man's weather-glass. See shepherd.

weather-gleam (weθ'ér-glēm), n. A peculiar appearance of clear sky near the horizon. [Prov. Eng.]

You have marked the lightning of the sky just above the horizon when clouds are about to break up and disappear. Whatever name you gave it, you would hardly improve on that of the weather-gleam, which in some of our dialects it bears.

Trench, (Imp. Dict.)

weather-hardened (weθ'ér-här'nd), a. Hardened by the weather; weather-beaten.

A countenance which, weather-hardened as it was, might have given the painter a model for a Patriarch.

Southey, The Doctor, ix.

weather-head (weθ'ér-hed), n. 1. A secondary rainbow. Hallucell. [Prov. Eng.]—2. Stripes of cirrus cloud. [Scotch.]

weather-headed (weθ'ér-hed'ed), a. Same as weather-head.

Sir, is this usage for your son?—for that old weather-headed fool, I know how to laugh at him; but you, Sir—

Congreve, Love for Love, ii. 7. (Darices.)

weather-house (weθ'ér-hous), n. Same as weather-box. Cowper, Task, i. 211.

weathering (weθ'ér-ing), n. [< ME. wederung; verbal n. of weather, v.] 1. Weather, especially favorable or fair weather.

For all trewe shipmen, and trewe pilgrymes, yat Godd for his grace yene hem weathering and passage, yat yeti mowen sately comen and gone.

English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 23.

Which would have bene, with the weathering which we had, ten or twelve dayes worke.

Hakluyt's Voyages, III. 515.

2. In geol., etc., the action of the elements in changing the color, texture, or composition of rock, in rounding off its edges, or gradually disintegrating it. The first effect of the weathering of rock-surfaces is discoloration. This arises in part from dust or dirt finding its way into the fissures, and is most quickly seen in large cities where much coal is burned. Discoloration often arises from the oxidation of some sulphur compound which the rock contains, and especially of iron pyrites, which is a widely disseminated mineral. Another very perceptible effect of weathering is the loss of the luster which many rock-constituents naturally have. This is particularly conspicuous in the case of feldspar, and is the result of incipient decomposition and hydration. Rounding of the edges of angular projections of the rock, or of its constituents, is another result of weathering, the decomposed minerals being more easily removed by the action of water than they were before decomposition. Weathering is a preliminary to erosion, but the rapidity with which these operations are carried on varies greatly with the nature of the rock and the climatic and other conditions to which it is subjected.

Many of them [modules of various kinds] are, also, externally marked in the same direction with parallel ridges and furrows, which have not been produced by weathering.

Darwin, Geol. Observations, i. 75.

3. In arch., a slight inclination given to an approximately horizontal surface to enable it to throw off water.

weathering-stock (weθ'ér-ing-stok), n. A post to which hawks are leashed in such a manner as to allow them limited exercise. See last quotation under weather, v. t., 1.

E'en like the hawk (whose keeper's wary hands

Have made a prisoner of her weathering stock).

Quarles, Emblems, V. ix. 5.

weatherliness (weθ'ér-lí-nes), n. 1. Weatherly character or qualities: said of ships and boats.

To combine the speed of the ordinary type of American sloop with the weatherliness of the English cutter.

Science, VI. 168.

2. Naut., the state of a vessel as to her capacity to ply speedily and quickly to windward.

weatherly (weθ'ér-lí), a. [< weather + -ly].

Naut., making very little leeway when close-hauled, even in a stiff breeze and heavy sea: noting a ship or boat.

Notwithstanding her weatherly qualities, the heavy cross sea, as she drove into it, headed her off bodily.

M. Scott, Tom Cringle's Log, viii.

weather-map (weθ'ér-map), n. A map showing the temperature, pressure, wind, weather, and other meteorological elements over an extensive region, compiled from simultaneous observations at a large number of stations. The pressure is represented by isobars, the temperature by isotherms, the wind by arrows, and the weather by differently shaded circles or other conventional symbols. Weather-maps, prepared once or twice daily, form the basis upon which every government weather-service forecasts the weather and issues storm-warnings.

weather-molding (weθ'ér-mól'ding), n. Same as dripstone, 1.

weathermost (weθ'ér-möst), a. superl. [< weather + -most]. Furthest to windward.

weather-notation (weθ'ér-nō-tā'shon), n. A system of abbreviation for the principal meteorological phenomena. Beaufort's weather-notation, which is used in Great Britain, is as follows: b, blue sky, whether clear or hazy; c, clouds (detached); d, drizzling rain; f, fog; g, very gloomy; h, hail; l, lightning; m, mist; o, overcast; p, passing, temporary showers; q, squally; r, rain; s, snow; t, thunder; u, ugly, threatening weather; w, dew.

weather-plant (weθ'ér-plant), n. The Indian leicece, Abrus precatorius; so named in view of an alleged property of indicating the weather in advance. It is a common tropical twining shrub (see Abrus), having pinnate leaves with from 20 to 40 small leaflets. Recent careful observations show that the pairs of leaflets fold together more or less as the light is stronger or weaker, the movement being less vigorous in a moister atmosphere; that a certain wrinkling of the surface co-exists with a coloring of the margin likely to be due to the attacks of an insect; and that the movement of the rachis, supposed to be barometric, is a diurnal oscillation which varies in extent with the amount of light. The temperature also affects the freedom of those motions. These characteristics are all paralleled in other plants, especially of the Leguminosæ. As a means of forecasting, the plant is not likely to be of practical worth.

weather-proof (weθ'ér-pröf), a. Proof against rough weather.

Lord, thou hast given me a cell

Wherein to dwell,

A little house, whose humble roof

Is weather-proof.

Herrick, A Thanksgiving to God for his House.

There were only ten persons at the conference meeting last night, and seven of them were women; he wonders how many weather-proof Christians there are in the parish.

C. D. Warner, Backlog Studies, p. 72.

weather-prophet (weθ'ér-pröf'et), n. [= Dan. veir-proft; as weather + prophet.] 1. One who foretells weather: one skilled in foreseeing the changes or state of the weather. [Colloq.]

Who that has read Greek does not know the humour with which the meteorological theories of the Athenian weather-prophets are ridiculed by Aristophanes in "The Clouds"? R. H. Scott, in Modern Meteorology, p. 166.

2. Anything in nature which serves as an indicator of weather changes, as a bird whose regular periodicity of migration or suddenness of appearance may indicate meteorological changes inappreciable by man.

Swallows have long been held for weather-prophets, and with reason enough in the quick response of their organization to the influence of atmospheric changes.

Cowes, Birds of the Colorado Valley (1878), I. 372.

3. A device for foretelling changes in the weather. In most forms materials are employed which are so affected by dampness as to move some indicator, as a pair of figures, of which one appears or advances in dry and the other in wet weather. Other forms employ materials which change color according to the state of the atmosphere. Compare weather-box.

weather-report (weθ'ér-ré-pört), n. A daily report of meteorological observations and of probable changes in the weather, especially one issued by a weather-service. [Colloq.]

weather-roll (weθ'ér-röl), n. The roll of a ship to windward, in a heavy sea on the beam: opposed to lee-burch.

weather-service (weθ'ér-sér-vis), n. An institution organized for taking meteorological observations in accordance with a systematic plan, and for utilizing the data thus collected by forecasting the weather, issuing warnings of storms and floods, publishing climatological tables, distributing information as to the effect of the weather on growing crops, and by allied services. All the principal governments of the world now maintain a weather-service, upon which a part or all of these duties are imposed. In the United States an annual appropriation of nearly a million dollars is made to the Weather Bureau of the Department of Agriculture, which is charged with performing these services. In addition to the Weather Bureau, and cooperating with it, there is organized in nearly every State a State weather-service, composed of voluntary observers whose work is directed toward giving information upon the condition of the crops as affected by the weather, and in general toward extending knowledge of local climatology.

weather-shore (weθ'ér-shör), n. The shore from which the wind blows.

[The wind] set so violently as rais'd on the sudden so greivous a sea that we could not recover the weather-shore for many houres.

Evelyn, Diary, Oct. 11, 1641.

weather-sign (weθ'ér-sin), n. Any phenomenon or sensation indicating state or change of weather; hence, generally, any prognostic or sign.

I am not old for nothing; I can tell

The weather-signs of love; you love this man.

Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, ii.

weather-spy (weθ'ér-spí), n. One who foretells the weather: a weather-prophet. [Rare.]

weather-stain (weθ'ér-stān), n. [< weather + stain.] A stain or discoloration left or produced by the weather or by weathering.

Walls must get the weather stain

Before they grow the ivy.

Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, viii.

He . . . felt that the shape and colour of every roof and weather-stain and broken hillock was good, because his growing senses had been fed on them.

George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, iii. 9.

With weather-stains upon the wall,

And stairways worn, and crazy doors,

Longfellow, Wayside Inn, Prelude.

weather-stained (weθ'ér-stānd), a. Stained or discolored by the weather. See weathering, 2.

A tomb somewhat weather-stained. Longfellow.

weather-station (weθ'ér-stā'shon), n. A station where daily meteorological observations are made and reported to a central office; one of the stations of a weather-service.

weather-strip (weθ'ér-strip), n. A slender strip of some material intended to keep out wind and cold; originally, a strip of wood covered with soft material, as list or cloth; specifically, a contrivance by which a strip of india-rubber is adjusted closely to the apertures of a door or window, or its frame or jamb, covering the crevice very tightly; it is generally a wooden molding into which a thin strip of rubber is fitted.

weather-strip (weθ'ér-strip), v. t.; pret. and pp. weather-stripp'd, pp. weather-stripping. To apply weather-strips to; fit or secure with weather-strips.

weather-symbol (weθ'ér-sim-bol), n. A conventional sign used in meteorological records, or in published meteorological observations or weather-maps, to represent graphically any designated phenomenon. The following symbols have been adopted by the International Meteorological Congress to represent the principal hydrometers and a few other phenomena. Rain, ☉; snow, ❄; thunderstorm, ⚡; lightning, ⚡; hail, ⚡; mist, ☁; frost, ❄; dew, ☁; snowdrift, ☁; high wind, ☁; solar corona, ☉; solar halo, ☉; lunar corona, ☉; lunar halo, ☉; rainbow, ☉; aurora, ☉; haze, ☉.

weather-tile (wēth'ēr-tīl), n. A tile used as a substitute for a weather-board in frame-buildings. These tiles are overlapped like shingles, and are held in place by nails driven through holes formed in the tiles in molding.

weather-vane (wēth'ēr-vān), n. A vane to show the direction of the wind; a weather-cock. See cut under vane.

weather-waft (wēth'ēr-wāft), a. Tossed or carried by the wind. [Rare.]

I cannot but fear that those men never Moored their Anchors well in the firme soile of Heaven that are weather-waft up and down with every eddy-wind of every new doctrine. N. Ward, Simple Colder, p. 29.

weather-wind (wēth'ēr-wīnd), n. [A corruption of withwind for withwind.] Bindweed. Hallucell, [Provincial].

weather-wise (wēth'ēr-wīz), a. [< ME. wēderwis; < weather + wise.] Skilful in prognosticating the changes of the weather.

For thorw werre and wykked werkes and wederes vresonallie, Wederwise shipmen and witti clerkes also Han no bilience to the lifte ne to the lore of filosofres. Piers Plouman (B), xv. 350.

weather-wisest (wēth'ēr-wīz'zēr), n. [< weather + wisest, indicator; cf. waywisest.] Something that foretells the changes of the weather.

The flowers of pimpernel, the opening and shutting of which are the countryman's weather-wisest. Derham, Physico-Theol., x, note.

weather-work (wēth'ēr-wōrk), n. Defense or provision against the wind, sea, etc. Cook, Voyages, III. i. 3. (Encyc. Diet.)

weather-worn (wēth'ēr-wōrn), a. [< weather + worn.] Worn, injured, or defaced by the action of the weather; weathered.

weather-wreck (wēth'ēr-wēk), n. A wreck by storms. [Rare.]

Well, well, you have built a nest That will stand all storms; you need not mistrust A weather-wreck. Brau, and Fl., Wit at Several Weapons, ii. 2.

weave (wēv), v.; pret. wove (formerly also waved), pp. woven (sometimes wore and formerly also weaved), ppr. weaving. [< ME. wēven; pret. waf, wof, pl. woren, woren, pp. woren.] < AS. wēfan (pret. wæf, pp. wafen) = MD. D. wēven = OIG. wēban, MIIG. G. wēben = leel, refa = Sw. väfra = Dan. være, weave (connection with Goth. bi-waihjan, wrap around, is doubtful) = Gr. √ io (orig. √ fao), in φῶς, ῥόος, a web, ῥαῖον, weave; cf. Skt. āruṇ-rūhi, a spider, lit. 'wood-weaver,' Skt. √ ca, weave, also Lith. veiras, a spinner, spider. From the root of wave are ult. E. web, weft, woof, waf, abh, etc.] I. trans. 1. To form by interlacing flexible parts, such as threads, yarns, filaments, or strips of different materials. See weaving.

Where the women wove hangings for the grove. 2 Ki. xxiii. 7.

And now his woven girths he breaks asunder. Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 266.

To wanton dalliance negligently laid, Prior, Solomon, ii.

We wove the Chaplet, and we crown the Bowl. Dryden.

These purple vests were woven by Dardan dames. Dryden.

2. To form a texture from; interlace or entwine into a fabric.

When she waved the sheldid silk. Shak., Pericles, iv., Procl., l. 21.

3. To intertwine; unite by intermixture or close connection; insert by or as by weaving.

She waf it wel, and wroot the story above. Chaucer, Good Women, l. 2364.

This waves itself perforce into my business. Shak., Lear, ii. l. 17.

The government of Episcopacy is now so waved into the common Law; In Gods name let wave out againe. Milton, Reformation in Eng., ii.

These words, thus woven into song. Bacon, Child Harold, iii. 112.

He carries off only such scraps in his memory as it is hardly possible to wave into a connected and consistent whole. Prescott, (Imp. Diet.)

4. To inclose by weaving something about.

The mind can wave itself warmly in the cocoon of its own thoughts and dwell in that anywhere. Low, Study Windows, p. 56.

5. To contrive, fabricate, or construct with design or elaborate care; as, to wave a plot.

For answer . . . Aesopus wave a long history of things that happened in the past, cut out under Deities, and of men which to save life for seek fath. Hobbes, Leviathan, Polity, vi. 6.

My brain, more busy than the laboring spider, Waves tedious snares to trap mine enemies. Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. l. 340.

Wove paper. See paper.

II. intrans. 1. To practise weaving; work with a loom.

Proclaim that I can sing, weave, sew, and dance. Shak., Pericles, iv. 6. 194.

They that pretend to wonders must weave cunningly. Fletcher, Spanish Curate, ii. 1.

2. To become woven or interwoven. [Rare.]

The amorous vine which in the elm still waves. W. Browne.

3. In the manège, to make a motion of the head, neck, and body from side to side like the shuttle of a weaver; said of a horse. Imp. Diet.

weave (wēv), n. [< wēvel, v.] The act or a style of weaving. [Trade use.]

A Practical Treatise on the Construction and Application of weaves for all Textile Fabrics. Nature, XXXVIII. 680.

The great difference between a twill and a plain, or between a plain and a satin weave. Fibre and Fabric, V. 15.

To shake; cause to waver; wave; brandish; toss; waft.

Autroze [dangerous] is thin euel, Ful wonderliche it the waves, wel I wot the sothe. William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 922.

Shaking a pike of fire in defiance of the enemy, and waving them amaine, we had them come aboard. Hakluyt's Voyages, III. 566.

2. To move; cause to move.

That comli ladi cayres to hire chaumber, & weaved up a window. William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 2978.

II. intrans. 1. To wave; waver; float about.

To cold coles sche schal be brent zit or come ene; & the aschis of hire body with the wind wave. William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 4368.

2. To move; go.

Thou wylnhez over thys water to wene. Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), i. 319.

He saugh the stroke come and werep a-side. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 389.

weavel, n. See weevil.

weaver (wē'vēr), n. [*< ME. werere, wever, < AS. wēfere = MD. D. wēver = OIG. wēheri, MIIG. wēbare, G. weber = Sw. väfrare = Dan. værer, a weaver; as wave + -er. Cf. webber.] 1. One who weaves; one whose occupation is weaving.

Weavers also of wolne and lynnyn. Quoted in Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), Pref., p. xlvii.

Weavers were supposed to be generally good singers. Their trade being sedentary, they had an opportunity of practising, and sometimes in parts, while they were at work. Warburton adds that many of the weavers in Queen Elizabeth's days were Flemish Calvinists, who fled from the persecution of the Duke of Alva, and were therefore particularly given to singing psalms. . . . Hence the exclamation of Falstaff, "I would I were a weaver! I could sing psalms, and all manner of songs." Nares.

2. In ornith., a weaver-bird. — 3. In entom.: (a)

A gyrrinid beetle; a whirligig; so called from its intricate circlings and gyrations on the surface of the water. See whirligig. 4. and cut under Gyrinidae. (b) A spinning-spider; a true araneid which weaves a web. Various groups of such spiders are distinguished by the form of their webs, as line-weavers, orb-weavers, tapestry-weavers, tube-weavers, tunnel-weavers, etc. See spider.

4. In ichth., same as wever. — Mahali weaver. See weaver-bird. — Sociable weaver. See weaver-bird. — Tapestry weaver. See tapestry. — Weavers' bottom, a chronic inflammation of a bursa situated over the tuberosity of the ischium, occurring as a result of sitting long and constantly on a hard seat. — Yellow-crowned weaver. See weaver-bird.

weaver-bird (wē'vēr-bīrd), n. One of numerous Old World (chiefly African and Indian) conirostral passerine birds, noted for the dexterity and ingenuity with which they weave the materials of their nests into a textile fabric, and also for the extraordinary size and unusual shape of some of these structures. The name weaver-bird, in its present broad sense, is modern, and appears to have originally specified a single species (see below). In the last and early in the present century the birds of this group which were then known were classed with the finches and grosbeaks, sometimes with the orioles, mainly according to the thickness of the bill, and some of them received still more misleading names. Though there was an Oriolus textor in 1788, the genus Ploceus was not named till 1817, and the family Ploceidae not till 1847. With the recognition of this large and varied group, as well marked from the Fringillidae by the possession of 10 instead of 9 primaries, an English name became a desideratum; and weavers, weaver-birds, or weaver-fishes became synonymous with Ploceidae, without implying that all the birds so named build very elaborate nests. (See Ploceus, Ploceidae.) Two remarkable types of nest may be noted. One is the hive-nest of the republican or sociable weavers, many pairs of which build in common an enormous domed structure. (See Ptilinopus, and cut under hive nest.) The other, the usual type of nest, is pensive or pendulous, and very closely woven, like that of the American hang-nests, but more elaborate, and with a hole in one side instead of being open at the top, in this respect resembling the nests of various titmice (dusht-tits and bottle-tits) and some wrens. These nests are generally slung at the ends of long, slender, drooping branches, often over the water of a pool or stream, where they are safest from monkeys and snakes. In some cases the males build additional nests for themselves, in which no eggs are to be laid — a habit, however, not confined to weaver-birds (see cock-nest). One of the largest, most characteristic, and best-known genera of weaver-birds is that African form called Oryx (a preoccupied name) by Lesson in 1831, and Pyronelana by Bonaparte in that year, though oftener called Euplectes (Swainson, 1837). There are 12 or 15 species, the characteristic coloration of which is black set off with scarlet or orange in large massed areas. P. oryx, the male of which is scarlet and black, is about 5 inches long; it was originally described by Edwards in 1751 as "the grenadier," from some fancied likeness of its plumage to a soldier's uniform. It inhabits South Africa. P. aurea of western Africa is the golden-backed finch and gold-backed grosbeak of the early ornithologists, being one of the yellow and black species. P. capensis, the Cape grosbeak of Latham, is another, from Cape Colony. P. taha, sometimes known as the Mahali weaver, and generally called Ploceus or Euplectes taha, is very small (scarcely 4½ inches long), of rich golden-yellow and velvety-black hues, and its nest is disproportionately large. It belongs to an extensive region of south-eastern Africa. (See cut under taha.) Several other African weavers represent the genus Ploceipasser, as P. mahali. There is a large series of small birds, all technically weavers (Ploceidae), which fall in the spernestic division of the family, and belong to numerous genera of the Ethiopian, Oriental, and even the Australian region, as various anadavats, waxbills, strawberry-finches, blood-finches, sengals, etc. (See Vidua (a), and cuts under Ploceus, Senegal, Tentoppygia, and waxbill.) The birds of an extensive Oriental and Australian genus Munia (with its subdivisions, as Padilla) belong here. (See cut under sparrow.) Fifteen species of Uroloncha, characterized by exerted middle tail-feathers, range from Africa to New Guinea; one of them is U. acuticauda. The genus Erythrura is another large one, reaching from India through much of Polynesia. None of the foregoing birds falls in the subfamily Ploceinae as now restricted. Among the latter may be noted the species of the African genus Sitagra, 6 in number, of which the best-known is S. capensis of Cape Colony, the olive oriole of Latham, commonly called yellow-crowned weaver and Ploceus intercephalus. This is 7 inches long, of an olive and golden-yellow and black color; it builds a large bottle-shaped or kidney-formed pensive nest. Poulia is a Madagascartype. The most extensive genus of all is the African Hyphantornis, with over 30 species, or the golden weavers, as H. galbula. These birds represent in Africa, or may be compared with, the hang-nest orioles of America. One of the longest- and best-known is H. cucullatus of western Africa, from Senegambia to the Gaboon; it has oftener been called H. textor (after Oriolus textor of Gmelin, 1788), and enjoys the distinction of being one of the first, if not the first, to which the name weaver attached, being the weaver oriole of Latham (1782); it is 6 inches long, yellow and black. Mulinbus is an African genus of black and crimson, scarlet, vermillion, or yellow coloration, as M. cristatus. The African genus Textor (one of the early names — Temminck, 1828) has 2 marked species, T. albastris (or alcto), the white-billed, and T. erythrorhynchus (or wiger), the red-billed. (See cut under Textor.) Finally, the genus Ploceus itself, as now restricted is an Oriental type of a few species, commonly called bayas-birds, though it used to be indiscriminately applied to any of the foregoing, and became the name-giving genus of the whole group. See cut under Ploceus. (For those Ploceidae known as whiteth-birds, see Vidua.)

Weaver-bird (Hyphantornis textor).

weaveress (wē'vēr-es), n. [< weaver + -ess.] A female weaver.

He found two looms alone remaining at work, in the hands of an ancient weaver and weaveress. J. H. Blunt, Hist. of Dursley, p. 222. (Davies.)

weaver-finch (wē'vēr-fīnch), n. Any weaver-bird.

The Ploceide, or weaver-finch.

A. R. Wallace, Distribution of Animals, II, 286.

weaver-fish (wē'vēr-fīsh), n. A fish of the genus Trachinus; a weever. See cut under Trachinus.

weaver-shell (wē'vēr-shel), n. A shuttle-shell.

weaver's-shuttle (wē'vērz-shut'l), n. The shuttle-shell, Radiola colva. See Oculum, and cut under shuttle-shell.

weavil, n. An old spelling of weevil.

weaving (wē'ving), n. [< ME. weyng, wef- finge; verbal n. of weavel, v.] 1. The act of one who or that which weaves; specifically, the act or art of producing cloth or other textile fabrics by means of a loom from the combination of threads or filaments. In weaving all kinds of fabrics, whether plain or figured, one system of threads, called the woof or weft, is made to pass alternately under and over another system of threads, called the warp, web, or chain. The essential operations are the successive raising of certain threads of the warp and the depression of others, so as to form a shed for the passage of the weft-warp, which is then beaten up by means of a lathe or batten. Weaving is performed by the hand in what are called hand-loom, or by steam-power in what are called power-loom, but the general arrangements for both are to a certain extent the same. (See loom.) Weaving, in the most general sense of the term, comprehends not only the manufacture of those textile fabrics which are prepared in the loom, but also that of network, lacework, etc. See cut under shuttle.

2. In the manège, the action of a horse that weaves, or moves the body from side to side.

weazand, n. See weasand.

weazelt, n. See weasel.

weazen (wē'zn). See wizen.

web (web), n. [< ME. web, webbe, < AS. web (webb-), a web (= OS. webbi = OFries. web, web = D. web, webbe, a web (= LG. web, webbe = OHG. weppi, weppi, MHG. weppe, webbe, webe, G. dial. webh (cf. G. gewerbe), web, woof, = Icel. veft = Sw. väf = Dan. væb, web), < wefan, weave: see weavel.] 1. That which is woven; a woven fabric; specifically, a whole piece of cloth in course of being woven, or after it comes from the loom.

Biholde how Eleyne hath a newe rote;

I wisse thanne it were myne and al the webbe after [i. e., all left after making the coat].

Piers Plowman (B), v. 111.

My dochter she's a thrifty lass;

She span seven year to me;

An' if it war weil counted up,

Full ten webs it would be.

Kenney Kaye (Child's Ballads, VIII, 140).

At noon

To-morrow come, and ye shall pay

Each fortieth web of cloth to me;

As the law is, and go your way.

M. Arnold, The Sick King in Bokhara.

2. Same as webbing, 1.—3. The warp in a loom. [Provincial.]—4. Something resembling a web or sheet of cloth; specifically, a large roll of paper such as is used in the web-press for newspapers.

Several men or boys are placed to receive the sheets (of paper) according to the number into which the width of the web is divided. Ure, Dict., III, 403.

5. Any one of various thin and broad objects, probably so named from some similarity to the thin, broad fabric of the loom. Especially—(a) A sheet or thin plate, as of lead.

There with stately pomp by heaps they wind,

And Christians slain roll up in webs of lead.

Fairfax, tr. of Tasso's Godfrey of Boulogne, x, 26.

(b) The blade of a sword.

A sword, whereof the web was steel;

Pommel, rich stone; hilts, gold, approved by touch.

Fairfax, tr. of Tasso's Godfrey of Boulogne, ii, 93.

(c) The blade of a saw. (d) The plate (or its equivalent) in a beam or girder which connects the upper and lower flat or laterally extending plates. (e) The corresponding part of a rail, between the tread and the foot. See cut under rail. (f) The flat part of a wheel, between the nave and the rim, as in some railway-wheels—occupying the space where spokes would be in an ordinary wheel. (g) The solid part of the bit of a key. (h) The part of an anvil below the head, which is of reduced size. (i) The thin, sharp part of the colter of a plow. See cut under plow. (j) A canvas cloth used in a saddle. (k) The basket-work of a gabion. See cut under gabion. (l) In a vehicle, a combination of bands or straps of a stout fabric, serving to keep the hood from opening too far. E. II. Knight. (m) The arm of a crank.

6. In ornith., the blade, standard, vane, or vexillum of a feather: so called from the texture acquired through the weaving or interlocking of the barbs by the barbules with their barbicels and hooklets. That vane which is furthest from the middle line of the bird's body is the outer web; the other, the inner web, is technically distinguished as pogonium externum and internum. The two often differ from each other in size, shape, or color, or in all these respects; the difference is most pronounced on the flight-feathers

(as seen in any quill pen) and lateral ruder feathers. See cuts under aftershaft, larb, medial, and penicil.

They [barbules] make the vane truly a web—that is, they so connect the barbs together that some little force is required to pull them apart.

Cones, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 81.

7. The plexus of very delicate threads or filaments which a spider spins, and which serves as a net to catch flies or other insects for its food; a cobweb; also, a similar substance spun and woven into a sort of fabric by many insects, usually as a covering or protection. See bug-worm, web-worm, and tent-caterpillar.

The Commissaries count 'a spiders webbe,

That doth entangle all the lesser flies.

Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 81.

Much like a subtle spider, which doth sit

In middle of her web, which spreadeth wide.

Sir J. Davies, Immortal, of Soul, xviii.

8. Figuratively, anything carefully contrived and elaborately put together or woven; a plot; a scheme.

All this is but a web of the wit; it can work nothing.

Lucan, Praise of Knowledge (ed. 1887).

The Fates at length the Blissful Web have spun.

Congreve, Birth of the Muse.

O, what a tangled web we weave

When first we practise to deceive!

Scott, Marmion, vi, 17.

It is one web of intricate complications between the Emperors of the East and West, the Republic of Venice, the Kings of Hungary, Dalmatia, and Bosnia.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 229.

9. In anat., a connective or other tissue; any open structure composed of fibers and membranes running into each other irregularly as if tangled, and serving to support fat or other soft substances. See tissue and histology.—

10. In zool., the membrane or fold of skin which connects the digits of any animal; especially, that which connects the toes of a bird or a quadruped, making the animal palmiped, and the foot itself palmate, as occurs in nearly all aquatic birds (hence called web-footed), and in many aquatic mammals, as the beaver, the muskrat, and ornithorhynchus. Webs sometimes occur as a congenital defect of the human fingers or toes. The relatively largest webs are those of the bat's wings. In birds the extent and special character of the webs (technically called palmæ) are taken into some account in classification, and some conditions of the webs receive special names. See web-footed, and cuts under bat, duckbill, fly-ing-frog, Ademian, otary, palmate, semipalmate, and totipalmate.

Some full-breasted swan

That, fluting a wild carol ere her death,

Ruffles her pure cold plume, and takes the flood

With swartly webs. Tennyson, Morte d'Arthur.

11. In coal-mining, the face or wall of a long-wall stall in course of being holed and broken down for removal. Gresley. [Midland coal-fields, Eng.]—Basal web, a small web between a bird's toes, extending little if any beyond the basal joints of the digits it connects. See cuts under Ereunetes and semipalmate.—Chain-web, a kind of saw; a scroll-saw.—Choroid web, the velum interpositum.—Emarginate web, a full web between a bird's toes, whose free border is notably concave or emarginate. See cut under totipalmate.—Geometrical spider's web. See geometric, and cut under triangle.—Holland web. Same as Holland, n. 1.—Incised web, a very deeply emarginate web of a bird's toes.—India-rubber web, a fabric in which a warp of rubber threads is filled with a weft of silk, linen, or cotton. The warp, rendered inelastic during the weaving, has its elasticity subsequently restored by a process in which the fabric is subjected to heat. Also called elastic web.—Mill-saw web, a thin saw carried in a vertical saw-gate, and used for resawing.—Pin and web. See pin.—Spider's web. See spiderweb.

web (web), v. t.; pret. and pp. webbed, ppr. webbing. [< ME. webben, < AS. webban, weave, web; from the noun.] 1. To cover with or as with a web; envelop.—2. To connect with a web, as the toes of a bird; render palmate.—Webbed fingers, two or more fingers of the human hand which are united by a band of connecting tissue, either occurring congenitally or as an abnormality, or resulting from cicatrization after burns and other wounds; dactylion. See web-fingered, and Dido's operation (under operation).—Webbed toes, a condition affecting the toes of the human foot, abnormally or accidentally, similar to that of webbed fingers. See web-footed.

webbe¹, n. [< ME. webbe, a weaver, < AS. webba, a weaver, < wefan, weave: see weavel, and cf. web. The ME. noun webbe survives in the proper name Webb.] A weaver. See webber.

A webbe, a dyer, and a tapicer.

Chaucer, Gen. Pro. to C. T., l. 362.

The webbes and the fullaris assembled hem alle,

Aut nakeden hure consail in hure commune halle.

Flemish Insurrection (Child's Ballads, VI, 270).

webbe², n. An old spelling of web.

webbing (web'ing), n. [< ME. webbyng; verbal n. of web, v.] 1. A woven material, especially one woven without pile, plainly and strongly. The term is applied to material or pieces of material which are intended for strength, to bear a weight, to be drawn tight, or the like, as a belt or surcingle, and also for that which serves to protect and cover the edge of a piece of more delicate fabric; thus, Eastern rugs are often made with several inches of webbing projecting beyond the part that is covered with pile.

2. In printing, the broad tapes used to conduct webs or sheets of paper in a printing-machine, or the broad straps or girths attached to the romee of the hand-press.—3. In zool., the webs of the digits collectively; as, the webbing is extensive or complete; the webbed state of the digits, or the formation of their webs; palmation. See web, n., 10.—Elastic webbing. See chastic.

webby (web'i), a. [< web + -y.] Relating to a web, or consisting of a web, in any sense; web-like; membranous.

Bats on their webby wings in darkness move,

And feebly shriek their melancholy love.

Cradock, Works, I, 50.

weber (vā'bēr), n. [After Wilhelm Weber (1804–1891), a German physicist.] A name proposed by Latimer Clarke for the unit of electrical quantity which has since been named coulomb; it was also for some time used for the practical unit of electrical current which is now called ampere.

Weberian (we-bēr'ian), a. [< Weber (see def.) + -ian.] Pertaining to or named after a person named Weber (in the following phrases E. H. Weber, 1795–1833, a German anatomist and physiologist).—Weberian apparatus, the whole of the parts or organs by means of which the air-bladder of some fishes is connected with the ear, including the Weberian ossicles and their connections.

An air-bladder connected with the auditory organ by intervention of a Weberian apparatus, formed of parts of the anterior vertebrae, modified after precisely the same plan as in the other silurids.

Amer. Nat., May, 1889, p. 427.

Weberian ossicles. See ossicle.

weber-meter (vā'bēr-mē'tēr), n. Same as ampere-meter or as coulomb-meter (see weber).

Weber's chronometer. A kind of metronome invented by Gottfried Weber, consisting of a weight and a graduated and adjustable cord. See metronome.

Weber's corpuscle. The depression in the verm montanum situated between the openings of the ejaculatory ducts.

Weber's experiment. The experiment of closing one ear to find that a vibrating tuning-fork placed with the end resting against the vertex will be heard more distinctly in that ear.

Weber's glands. The mucous glands of the tongue.

Weber's law. See *law*¹.

Weber's paradox. The fact that a muscle, when so stretched that it cannot contract, may elongate.

web-eye (web'i), n. In pathol., same as pterygium, 2.

web-eyed (web'id), a. Exhibiting or affected with the disease called web-eye.

web-fingered (web'fing gerd), a. Having the fingers of the hand, or any digits of the fore limb, connected by means of more or less extensive webs formed of a fold of skin; as, the bat is a completely web-fingered animal. The fingers of the human hand are naturally webbed a little at the base, and sometimes connected for their whole length, constituting a congenital deformity. Compare webbed fingers (under web, v. t.), and see cuts under bat, fly-ing-frog.

He was, it is said, web-footed naturally, and partially web-fingered.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, II, 137.

web-foot (web'füt), n. A foot whose toes, or some of them, are webbed; also, the condition of being web-footed. As applied to persons, it implies an abnormal condition, corresponding to the web-fingered.—Gillie web-foot. See gillie.

web-footed (web'füt ed), a. Having web-feet; being web-toed, whether as an abnormality of persons, or as the natural formation of the feet of many aquatic animals. Many mammals are web-footed, as the seal, the otter, the muskrat, the beaver, and the duck-mole. Nearly all swimming and many wading birds are web-footed, to a varying extent in different cases. The salient batrachians are mostly web-footed, especially frogs, as to their hind feet. See web, n., 10, web, v. t., webbing, 3, pinniped, palmiped, semipalmate, totipalmate, with various cuts, and those under fly-ing-frog, duckbill, and otary.

web-footedness (web'füt ed-ness), n. Web-foot; the state of being web-footed.

web-machine (web'ma-shēn), n. Same as web-press.

Wedge.

Yf thai nyl here, a wedge oute of a bronde
Yvrought dryve in the roote, or sumdel froo
Let diehe and fild with asshen let it stonde, Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 53.
Thorw wich pyn ther goth a lictl wedge which that is cleped the hors.
Chaucer, Astrolabe.
For tis with Pleasure as it is with Wedges; one drives out another.
N. Bailey, tr. of Colloquies of Erasmus, I, 157.

2. A mass resembling a wedge in form; anything in the form of a wedge.

They gather it [gold] with great labour and mette it and caste it, fyrste into masses or wedges, and afterwarde into brode plates.
R. Eden, tr. of Sebastian Munster (First Books on America, ed. Arber, p. 29).

Open the mails, yet guard the treasure sure;
Lay out our golden wedges to the view.
Marlowe, Tamburlaine, I, i. 12.
A wedge of gold of fifty shekels weight. Josh. vii. 21.
See how in warlike muster they appear,
In rhombs, and wedges, and half-moons, and wings.
Milton, P. R., iii. 309.

3. In her., a bearing representing a triangle with one very acute angle—that is, like a pile, but free in the escutcheon instead of being attached to one of its edges.—4. In Cambridge University, the name given to the man whose name stands lowest on the list of the classical tripos: said to be a designation suggested by the name (Wedgewood) of the man who occupied this place on the first list (1824). Compare wooden spoon, under spoon.

Five were Wranglers, four of these Double men, and the fifth a favorite for the Wedge. The last man is called the Wedge, corresponding to the Spoon in Mathematics.
C. A. Bristed, English University, p. 312.

Foxtail wedge. Same as fox-wedge.—The thin or small end of the wedge, figuratively, an initiatory move of small apparent importance, but calculated to produce or lead to an ultimate important effect.—Wedge of least resistance, the form in which loose earth and other substances yield to pressure.—Wooden wedge. Same as wedge, 4.

wedge¹ (wej), v.; pret. and pp. wedged, ppr. wedging. [late ME. wedgen; from the noun.]
I. trans. 1. To cleave with a wedge or with wedges; rive.

My heart,
As wedged with a sigh, would rive in twain.
Shak., T. and C., i. 1. 35.

2. To drive as a wedge is driven; crowd or compress closely; jam.

Among the crowd of the Abbey; where a finger
Could not be wedged in more.
Shak., Hen. VIII., iv. 1. 58.

Wedged in the rocky shoals, and sticking fast.
Dryden, Enclid, v. 285.

The age had not so much refinement that any sense of impropriety restrained the wearers of petticoat and farthingale from stepping forth into the public ways, and wedging their not unsubstantial persons . . . into the throng nearest to the scaffold at an execution.
Hawthorne, Scarlet Letter, ii.

3. To fasten with a wedge or with wedges; fix in the manner of a wedge: as, to wedge on a scythe; to wedge in a rail or a piece of timber.—4. In ceram., to cut, divide, and work together (a mass of wet clay) to drive out bubbles and render it plastic, just before placing it on the wheel.—5. To make into the shape of a wedge; render coniform.—6. To force apart or split off with or as with a wedge.

Yawning fissures which will surely widen until they wedge off the projecting masses, and strip huge slices from the face of the cliff.
Geikie, Geol. Sketches, ii.

II. intrans. To force one's way like a wedge.

Hamming
The Globes and Mermaids, wedging in with lords Still at the table. B. Jonson, Devil is an Ass, iii. 1.

wedge² (wej), n. [A dial. var. of wedge, wage.]
A pledge; a gage. Hallivell.

wedgebill (wej'bil), n. A humming-bird of the genus Schistes, having the bill of peculiar shape, rather thick for a hummer, and suddenly sharp-pointed. There are 2 species, both Ecuadorian, S. geoffroyi and S. personatus, 3½ inches long. See ent in preceding column.

wedge-bone (wej'bôn), n. An ossicle often found on the under surface of the spinal column at the junction of any pair of vertebrae; more fully called subvertebral wedge-bone.

Such a separate ossification, or sub-vertebral wedge-bone, is commonly developed beneath and between the odontoid bone and the body of the second vertebra [in Lacer. tibia].
Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 187.

wedge-cutter (wej'kut'ér), n. 1. An instrument used in dentistry to cut off the projecting part of a wedge that has been driven between two teeth.—2. In wood-working, a machine for relishing and cutting the wedges of a door-rail. See *relish*². E. H. Knight.

wedged (wej'd), a. [wedge + -ed.] In zool., wedge-shaped; euneiform or euneate: as, a wedged bone; the wedged tail of a bird.

wedge-micrometer (wej'mi-krom e-tér), n. See micrometer.

wedge-photometer (wej'tô-tom'e-tér), n. An instrument for measuring the brightness of stars. It consists of a long wedge of neutral-tinted dark glass arranged to slide before the eyepiece of a telescope, and provided with a graduated scale. The scale-reading, which corresponds to the thickness of the wedge at the point where the image of the star becomes invisible, determines the star's brightness.

wedge-press (wej'pres), n. A press for extracting oil from seeds, as hemp-seed, sunflower-seed, etc., by crushing. It has perforated iron cheek-plates, between which the seeds are placed in hair bags, with blocks and wedges between the bags and the plates. A tightening-wedge is then driven in by a man, and the juice escapes through the perforations in the plates, and is collected in a cistern below.

wedge-shaped (wej'shâpt), a. Having the shape of a wedge; wedged; euneiform; euneate: as, a wedge-shaped leaf; the wedge-shaped tail of a bird: usually noting surfaces, without regard to solidity.—Wedge-shaped isobar, an isobar bounding a projecting area of high pressure moving along between two cyclones.

wedge-tailed (wej'tâld), a. Having the tail wedged or euneate: noting birds whose tail-feathers are regularly graduated in length to such an extent that the tail when moderately spread appears to be beveled off obliquely at the end from the middle to the outermost feather on each side. It is a very common formation. See ent under Sphenocercus, Sphenura, Trichoglossus, and Uroæetus.—Wedge-tailed eagle, Uroæetus aulaz, of Australia. See ent under Uroæetus.—Wedge-tailed pigeon or dove. See Sphenocercus (with ent).

wedge-valve (wej'valv), n. A wedge-shaped valve driven into its seat by a screw: used for closing water-mains, etc.

wedging (wej'ing), n. 1. A method of joining timbers, in which the tenon is made just long enough to pass through the mortised piece, and a small wedge is driven into a saw-cut in the end of the tenon, with the effect of expanding it, and thus preventing its withdrawal.—2. In kneading clay for fine modeling, the process of cutting the clay to pieces, as by means of a strained wire, and then throwing the severed pieces forcibly upon the mass, the object being to expel the air.—Foxtail wedging. See foxtail.

wedging-crib (wej'ing-krib), n. In mining, in shaft-sinking in very watery ground, a curb or crib on which the tubbing is placed. It generally consists of pieces of oak carefully shaped and joined together. Between the exterior of this curb and the rock there is left a space of a few inches in width, which is made water-tight by the most careful wedging and the use of moss. The object of the whole arrangement of the wedging-crib and the tubbing which rests upon it is permanently to hold back the water which would otherwise find its way into the shaft and have to be raised to the surface by pumping. In some mining districts the wedging-crib is made of cast-iron.

Wedgwood scale. A scale used by the inventor in measuring high temperatures by his pyrometer: as, 10° Wedgwood. The zero corresponds to 1077° F.

Wedgwood ware. See *ware*².

wedgy (wej'gi), a. [*wedge*¹ + -y.] Formed or adapted to use as a wedge; fitted for prying into or among.

Pushed his wedgy snout far within the straw subjacent.
Landor, (Imp. Dict.)

wedhood¹ (wed'hüd), n. [ME. wedhod; < wed + -hood.] The state of marriage.

Save in here wedhod

That ys feyre to fore God.
MS. Cott. Claud. A. II. f. 129. (Hallivell.)

wedlock (wed'lok), n. [ME. wedlar, wedlak, wedlake, wedlank, wedlock, matrimony, marriage, < AS. wedluc, pledge, < wed, a pledge, + lac, a gift, etc.; see wed and *lake*², *lake*¹. The compound wedluc is supposed to mean 'a gift given as a pledge,' hence a gift given to a bride, but the second element is perhaps to be taken in the sense of 'condition, state,' being ult. nearly identical with the suffix in knowledge, etc.] 1. Marriage; matrimony; the married state; the vows and sacrament of marriage. Sometimes used attributively.

Which that men clepeth sponsall or wedlock.
Chaucer, Clerk's Tale, l. 59

You would sooner commit your grave here to this knot than to the wedlock noose. B. Jonson, Epicene, ii. 1.

By holy crosses . . . she kneels and prays
For happy wedlock hours. Shak., M. of V., v. 1. 32.

2^d. A wife.

Which of these is thy wedlock, Menelaus? thy Helen, thy Lucece?
B. Jonson, Poetaster, iv. 1.

To break wedlock, to commit adultery. Ezek. xvi. 38.

Howe be it, she kept but enyll the sacrament of matrimony, but brake her wedlock.

Berners, tr. of Froissart's Chron., I. xxi.

=Syn. 1. Matrimony, Wedding, etc. See marriage.
wedlock (wed'lok), v. t. [wedlock, n.] To unite in marriage; marry.

Man thus wedlocked. Milton, Divorce, ii. 15.

Wednesday (wenz'dä), n. [ME. Wednesday, Wodnesdei, Wodnesdai, < AS. Wodnes day = D. Woensdag = Icel. Oðinsdag = Sw. Dan. Onsdag (for Odensdag*); lit. 'Woden's day': AS. Wodnes, gen. of Woden = OS. Wōdan, Wādan = OHG. Wōtan, Wātan = Icel. Óðinn (> E. Odan), Woden; prob. lit. 'the furious,' i. e., the mighty warrior, < AS. woad, etc., furious, raging, mad; see *woad*².] The fourth day of the week: the day next after Tuesday. Abbreviated W., Wed. See *wed*¹.—Pulver Wednesday¹. Same as Ash Wednesday.

wedsett, v. t. [ME. wedsatten; < wed + set. Cf. wadset.] To pledge; same as wadset.

wee¹ (wē), n. and a. [ME. we, in the phrase a little we, a little bit, a short way or space, appar. for a little way, the form we being appar. a Scand. form (Icel. vigr, a way, = Sw. vigr = Dan. vej) of way; see *way*¹.] Little and wee were and are so constantly associated that they have become synonymous, and wee has changed to an adjective. Cf. way-bit, equiv. to wee bit. E. wee cannot be connected with OHG. wenac, G. wenig, little.] I. n. A bit. Specifically—(a) A short distance.

Behind hir a littill wee
It [a stone] fell.
Barbour, Bruce (E. E. T. S.), xvii. 677.

Any one of those herbaceous plants which are useless and without special beauty, or especially which are positively troublesome. The application of this general term is somewhat relative. Handsome but pernicious plants, as the oxeye daisy, cone-flower, and the purple cow-wheat of Europe (Medicago arvensis), are weeds to the agriculturist, flowers to the esthetic. So also plants that are cultivated for use or beauty, as grasses, hemp, carrot, parsnip, morning-glory, become weeds when they spring up where they are not wanted. The exotics of cool countries are sometimes weeds in the tropics.

On fat londe and ful of donge foulest weedes groweth.
Piers Plowman (C), xiii. 224.

An ill weed grows apace. Bean, and FL. Concord, iv. 3.

E. also weke; < ME. weke, wike, wake, woke, wonke (pl. wiken, woken, wikes, wukes, wokes), a week, period of seven days, *< AS. wice, wien, wicu, wucu = OS. wika = OFries. wike = MD. weke, D. week = MLG. weke, LG. weke, wek, week = OHG. wehha, also woha (> Finnish wika), MHG. weche, weche, G. weche, week, = Icel. vika = Sw. vecka = Dan. uge* (for uge), a week, = Goth. wikō, found in the phrase wikōn kunjis semis, tr. Gr. ἐν τῇ τῆς ἐβδομήκοντος αἰῶνος, L. in ordine vicis sue, 'in the order of his course,' Luke i. 8, but prob. to be taken, in the Goth., as 'in the week or period of his course,' wikōn appearing to mean 'succession,' 'change,' hence 'recurrent period,' and to be allied to Icel. vika, turn, return, etc.; see weak. The collocation of the Goth. wikōn and the L. vicis in this passage, and the resemblance of form, have given rise to the notion that the Tent. word is borrowed from the L.; but the L. word equiv. to wikōn is ordine, and there is no evidence that L. vicis was ever used in the sense 'week.'] 1. A period of seven days, of which the days are numbered or named in like succession in every period — in English, Sunday (or first day, etc.), Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, Saturday (or seventh day); hence, a period of seven days.

The week is not dependent upon any other period, as a subdivision of that period, but cuts across the division-lines of month and year alike with its never-ending repetition. In general Jewish and Christian belief, it is founded on the creation of the world in six days (according to the account in Genesis), with a succeeding seventh day of rest, specially commemorated by the Jewish rest-day, or Sabbath, our Saturday. It has also been conjectured to represent a fourth of the lunar month of about 28 days; but no people is known as having made and maintained such a subdivision of the month. As a period and division of time, its use is limited to Jews and Christians (including also in some measure the Mohammedans, by derivation from these); but the week-day names and their succession are found more widely, and are of a wholly different origin; they rest upon an astrological principle, which assigns each day in succession to one of the planets as regent; and they further involve a division of the day into 24 hours. If the planets are arranged in the order of their distance from us as held by the ancients — namely, Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Sun, Venus, Mercury, Moon, — then, if the first hour of a day is allotted to Saturn, and each following hour to the next planet, the 25th hour, or the first of the next day, will fall to the Sun, the 49th, or the first of the following day, to the Moon, and so to Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, Venus, in succession; and each planet being reckoned as regent of the whole day of whose first hour it is regent, the days are Sun's day, Moon's day, Mars' day, and so on to Saturn's day, where the same succession is taken up anew. These names were unknown to, or at least never used by, the Jews, nor do they appear in classical Greek, nor do the Mohammedans employ them; but they passed from Roman use to European, and not only in their Latin forms, but also as translated into Germanic languages, the names of Germanic divinities being, by a rude identification, substituted in them for those of the Roman, as Mars, etc., without any regard to the planets (see the names Tuesday, etc.); and they are found also in India, which doubtless received them, with the rest of its astronomy and astrology, from Greece and Rome. The Indian days are coincident with our days of the same name — that is, it is Sun's day there when it is our Sunday, and so on. But there is no other than an astrological significance belonging to the names there; a week as a division of time is wholly unknown to both ancient and modern India. In law, week is sometimes construed to mean any period of seven full days, and sometimes to mean such a period beginning with the beginning of a Sunday. Thus, a requirement of "a week's notice" may be satisfied by the lapse of any seven consecutive days, but a publication of a notice "once in each week for three weeks before the sale" is held to contemplate three weeks reckoned as from Sunday to Sunday, not merely 21 days before the sale. Abbreviated w., wk.

By twyne the Cytee of Darke and the Cytee of Raphane ys a Ryvere, that men clepen Sabatarye. For on the Saturday hyt remeth faste; and alle the Woke elles hyt stondeth stytle, and remeth nonzt or hylt.

Fuller, Pisgah Sight, II. xii. 15. (Davies.)

Weeping ash, the variety pendula of the European ash, Fraxinus excelsior, having the branches arching downward instead of upward.—Weeping birch, a variety of the white birch, Betula alba, of a weeping habit, common in Europe, and often cultivated for ornament. Its shoots when young are quite smooth, but when mature are of a bright chestnut-brown, covered with little white warts.—

Weeping eczema, eczema attended with considerable exudation; moist eczema.—Weeping grass, a grass, Microlaena (Ehrharta) stipoides, of Australia and New Zealand, so called doubtless from the form of its panicle. It is a perennial grass, keeping green through the year, and valued for grazing. Mueller, Select Extra-trop. Plants.

—Weeping oak. See oak.—Weeping pipe, a small pipe connected with a tank or water-closet supply-pipe, and designed to allow a little water to escape at intervals so as to preserve the seal in traps.—Weeping poplar. See poplar.—Weeping rock, a porous rock from which water oozes.—Weeping sinew, a gathering of fluid in the synovial sheath of a tendon; ganglion.—Weeping willow. See *willow*¹.

II. trans. 1. To lament; bewail; bemoan.

Pensive she sat, revolving fates to come,
And wept her godlike son's approaching doom.

Pope, Hiad, xxiv. 114.

Nor is it

Wiser to weep a true occasion lost,

But trim our sails, and let old hygones be.

Tennyson, Princes, iv.

To weep his obsequies.

Dryden, Æneid, ix. 648.

2. To shed or let fall drop by drop, as tears; give out in drops.

Then thou hast wept [var. wopen] many a drop.

Chaucer, Troilus, l. 941.

Sir Gawein that thei of badde grete pite hit toke with glibbe chere and myri, and wepte right tenderly water with his eyen vndir his helme.

Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 477.

Weep your tears

Into the channel.

Shak., J. C., i. 1. 63.

Groves whose rich trees wept odorous gums and balm.

Milton, P. L., iv. 248.

3. To spend or consume in weeping; exhaust in tears; usually followed by away, out, or the like.

Weep my life away.

Tennyson, Merlin and Vivien.

I could weep

My spirit from mine eyes.

Shak., J. C., iv. 3. 99.

To weep millstones¹. See millstone.

weep¹ (wēp), n. [< ME. wēpe, wēp, a later form, after the verb, of wēp, < AS. wēp, clamor, cry; see *wēp*¹, v.] 1. Weeping; a fit of weeping.

She began to breste a wepe anon.

Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 408.

Wid rewell late, and sorwe, and wepe.

Genesis and Exodus (E. E. T. S.), 1. 2328.

2. Exudation; sweat, as of a gum-tree; a leak, as in the joint of a pipe. [Obsolete, colloq., or trade use.]

weep², n. [Imitative.] Same as weep for weep. Also wēpe, wēp.

weepable (wē'pā-bl), a. [Early mod. E. wēp-able; < *wēp*¹ + -able.] Exciting or moving to tears; lamentable; grievous. Bp. Peacock.

weeper (wē'pēr), n. [< *wēp*¹ + -er.] 1. One who weeps; one who sheds tears; specifically, a hired mourner at a funeral.

If you have served God in a holy life, send away the women and the weepers; tell them it is as much intemperance to weep too much as to laugh too much.

Jer. Taylor, Holy Living, ii. 6.

Laughing is easy, but the wonder lies

What store of brine supplied the weeper's eyes.

Dryden, tr. of Juvenal's Satires, x. 46.

2. Something worn conventionally as a badge of mourning. (a) A strip of white linen or muslin worn on the end of the sleeve like a cuff. The term is also used for the band of crape worn as a mark of mourning.

Our . . . mourners clap bits of muslin on their sleeves, and these are called weepers.

Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, xvi.

There was not a widow in all the country who went to such an expense for black bombazine. She had her beautiful hair confined in crimped caps, and her weepers came over her elbows.

Thackeray, Bluebeard's Ghost.

(b) A long hatband, like a scarf, of crape or other black stuff, worn by men at a funeral.

It is a funeral street, Old Parr Street, certainly; the carriages which drive there ought to have feathers on the roof, and the butlers who open the doors should wear weepers.

Thackeray, Philip, ii.

(c) The long black crape veil worn by a widow in her weeds.

Most thankful I shall be to see you with a couple of pounds' worth less of crape. . . . If anybody was to marry me flatterer himself I should wear these hideous weepers two years for him, he'd be deceived by his own vanity, that's all.

George Eliot, Middlemarch, lxxxv.

3. Anything resembling a weeper in senses 1 and 2 in shape or use.

The firs were hung with weepers of black-green moss.

B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 169.

The eyes with which it (the aqueduct tunnel) weeps are rightly called weepers, being small rectangular openings in the side walls, through which all the water collected and collecting on the outside of the masonry pours into the inside.

New York Tribune, February 2, 1890.

4. The South American capuchin monkey, Cebus capucinus.

weepful (wē'fūl), a. [< *wēp*¹, n., + -ful.] Full of weeping; mournful. Weylif.

weeping (wē'pīng), n. [< ME. wēpinge, wēpyng; verbal n. of *wēp*¹, v.] Wailing; lamentation; shedding of tears.

With myche weepyng & woo thes wordes he said.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 8489.

There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

Mat. viii. 12.

weeping-cross (wē'pīng-kros), n. A cross, often of stone, erected on or by the side of a highway, at which penitential devotions were performed.

One is a kind of weeping-cross, Jack,
A gentle purgatory.

Fletcher and Shirley, Night-Walker, i. 1.

For here I mourn for you, our publick losse,

And doe my penance at the weeping-cross.

Witber, Prince Henry's Obsequies.

To return or come home by weeping-cross, to suffer defeat in some adventure; meet with repulse or failure; hence, to repeat of having taken a certain course or engaged in a certain undertaking.

The judgement stands, onely this verdit too:

Had you before the law foreseen the losse,

You had not now come home by weeping-cross.

Heywood, If you Know not me (Works, ed. 1874, I. 267).

But the time will come when, coming home by Weeping-Cross, thou shalt confess that it was better to be at home.

Lghu, Euphues and his England.

weepingly (wē'ping-li), adv. [< weeping + -ly.] With weeping; in tears.

She took her son into her arms weepingly laughing.

Sir H. Wotton, Reliquiae.

weeping-ripe (wē'ping-rīp), a. Ready to weep.

The king was weeping-ripe for a good word.

Shak., I. L. L., v. 2. 274.

weeping-spring (wē'ping-spring), n. A spring that very slowly discharges water.

weeping-widow (wē'ping-wid'ō), n. The guinea-hen flower, Fritillaria Melanensis. Britten and Holland. [Prov. Eng.] weepily (wē'pī), a. [< ME. wepili; < weep + -ly.] Weeping; tearful.

Chaucer, Boethius, i. prose 1.

weepy (wē'pī), a. [< weep + -y.] Moist; springy; exuding moisture; oozy; seepy; as, weepy clay; weepy stone. [Prov. Eng.] weerisht, a. Same as wearith.

weesand, n. An old spelling of weasand.

weese-allen (wē'sal en), n. The jäger or skua-gull. See dirty-allen. Also wease-allan, weese-allan, weese-aulin.

weeselt, n. An old spelling of weasel.

weet¹, v. An obsolete form of wit¹.

weet² (wēt), n. An obsolete or dialectal form of wit¹.

weet³ (wēt), n., a., and v. A dialectal form of wet¹.

weet⁴ (wēt), a. A dialectal form of weight².

weet⁵ (wēt), n. [Imitative.] The peewee, or common sandpiper. See Tringoides.—Weet-my-feet, an imitative name for the common quail, Coturnix coturnix (or dactylisiana). [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.] weet⁶ (wēt), v. i. [See weet⁴, n.] To cry as a weat or peewee.

A sand-piper glided weet weeting along the shore.

S. Judd, Margaret, i. 2.

weet-bird (wēt'bīrd), n. [< weet⁴ + bird¹. Cf. peewee.] The wryneck, Tyrus torquilla: from its cry. See cut under wryneck.

weeting¹, weetingly. See witting, wittingly.

weetless¹, a. An obsolete form of witless.

weetweet (wēt'wēt), n. Same as wee¹.

weewer¹, n. Same as weaver-bird. Latham, 1782.

weever² (wē'vēr), n. [Formerly spelled weaver, and appar. a particular use of weaver¹. Zoologists now connect it with the L. specific name ripara, as if weaver were a var. of the obs. wirer.] Either one of two British fishes of the genus Trachinus, the greater, T. draco, 10 or 12 inches long, and the lesser, T. ripera, of half this length; hence, any member of the Trachinidae (which see). These fishes have sharp dorsal and opercular spines, with which they may inflict a painful and serious wound when incautiously handled. It does not appear that the spines convey a specific poison, but they are smeared with a slime which causes the puncture they inflict to fester, like the similar wound from the tail spine of the sting ray. See cut under Trachinus.

weever-fish (wē'vēr-fish), n. Same as weever².

weevil (wē'vī), n. [Early mod. E. also wevil, weevil, wevil; < ME. wevil, wevil, wevil, wevil, < AS. weol, in an early gloss wibil, a beetle (cf. wibba n. scara-wibba, dung-beetle), = OS. wivil = MHG. wivil = D. wivil = OHG. wibil, wibil, MHG. wibil, G. wibel, wibel, a weevil, = Icel. gífl (in comp. lind gífl, dung-beetle).] 1. A snout-beetle; any coleopterous insect of the section Rhynchophora (which see). The term is more properly restricted to the long-nosed forms of the family Curculionidae, but is also extended (beyond the Rhynchophora) to the family Erichsonidae. The weevils are almost exclusively plant-feeders; most of them live in nuts, grains, the stems of plants, rolled-up leaves, catkins, or fruit, while others are leaf-miners, and a few live in gall-like excrescences on the stems or roots of plants. Hydrophilus contains the only carnivorous forms, and these are said to live on bark lice. Some forms are sub-aquatic, as the water-weevil, Dytiscidae clavipes. See phrases following, and cuts under Anthrenus, Balaninus, boia-weevil, Erichson, Calandra, clover-weevil, Com- trachelus, diamond-beetle, Epicerus, pea-weevil, Pissodes, plum-gouger, Rhynchophorus, and seed-weevil.

The wheat which is not turned is eaten with weevils.

Guevara, Letters (tr. by Bellows, 1577), p. 94.

About this time it chanced a pretty secret to be discovered to preserve their corn from the fly, or weevil, which did in a manner as much hurt as the rats.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, II. 161.

The Thunder, which went to Bermuda the 17th October, now returned, bringing corn and goats from Virginia, (for the weevils had taken the corn at Bermuda before they came there). Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 159.

2. Any insect which damages stored grain, as the fly-weevil, a local name in the southern United States for the grain-moth, Glebea cerealella. See grain-moth, 2.—3. The larva of the wheat-midge, Diplosis tritici. Also called red weevil. C. F. Riley. [Western U. S.]—

Apple-blossom weevil, Anthrenus pomorum, which attacks the flower-buds of the apple in Europe.—Apple-weevil, Anthrenus quadrigibbus, a weevil which infests the fruit of the apple in the United States. Commonly called apple-curculio. See apple-curculio, and cut under Anthrenus.—

Cabbage-weevil, Ceuthorrhynchus napi, whose larva bore the crown of young cabbages in Europe, and which is supposed to have been introduced recently into the United States.—Chestnut-weevil, Balaninus caragripes, a very long nosed weevil whose larva is the common chestnut-grub of the United States.—

Clover-weevil. (a) See clover-weevil (with cut). (b) Phytonomus punctatus, whose larva feed on the leaves of clover in Europe and the United States. (c) Sitona crinitus and S. flavescens, which feed upon the leaves of clover in Europe, their larva boring in the roots. The latter has been introduced into the United States.—

Cranberry-weevil, Anthrenus saturatus.—Grape-weevil. (a) Crapronia inaequalis, which attacks the fruit of the grape in the United States. (b) Otiorynchus sulcatus and O. picipes, which feed upon the leaves and shoots of the grape in Europe. (c) Rhynchites betuleti, a formidable grape-pest in Europe, which rolls the leaves of the vine.—

Hazelnut-weevil, Balaninus nucum.—Hickory-nut weevil, Balaninus nasicus, whose larva is found commonly in hickory-nuts in the United States.—

Imbricated weevil, Epicerus imbricatus, of the United States. See Epicerus (with cut).—Ironwood leaf-weevil, an undetermined weevil which mines the leaves of ironwood in the United States.

—Leaf-rolling weevil, any weevil whose larva lives in a leaf-roll, as Attelabus bipunctulatus of the United States, whose larva rolls the leaves of oak.—

New York weevil, Ithycerus noreboracensis, the adult of which gnaws the twigs of fruit-trees in the United States, while its larva devours the interior of oak and hickory-twigs.—

Oak-bark weevil, Maydalis olivae, which lives under the bark of oak in the United States.—

Palm-weevil, Rhynchophorus palmorum, R. ferrugineus, and allied species, which bore into the trunk of palm-trees. See palm-worm, under worm.—

Pear-shaped weevil, any weevil of the genus Apion, as A. apicatus, an enemy to clover in England. See cuts under clover-weevil and seed-weevil.—

Pitch-eating weevil, Pachylabus picivorus, which lives under the bark of the pitch-pine in the United States.—

Potato-stalk weevil, Trichobaris (or Buridius) triangatus, a weevil whose larva bores the stalks of the potato in the middle United States.—

Quince-weevil, Conotrachelus crataegi, which bores into the fruit of the quince in the United States.—

Rhubarb-weevil, Lixus concavus, which bores the stems of rhubarb in the middle United States.—

Rose-weevil, Anagrus fulvipes, whose larva burrows in the roots of the rose.—

Strawberry-weevil. (a) The strawberry-crown-borer (which see, without, under strawberry). Thyloderma fragariae, whose larva bores into the root crown of the strawberry in the United States. (b) Anthrenus muscivorus, the adult of which destroys the blossoms and flower-stalks of the strawberry in the eastern United States.—

White-pine weevil. See Pissodes (with cut). (See also avara-weevil, bean-weevil, diamond-weevil, grain-weevil, nut-weevil, pea-weevil, pine-weevil, plum-weevil, rice-weevil, seed-weevil, water-weevil, wheat-weevil.)

weeviled, weevilled (wē'vīd), a. [< weevil + -ed.] Infested or infected with weevils, as grain.

weevily, weevilly (wē'vī-i), a. [< weevil + -ly.] Same as weeviled.

wee-wow¹ (wē'wō), a. [Appar. a redupl. var. of wow. < AS. woh, crooked.] Wrong. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.] wee-wow² (wē'wō), v. [< wee-wow¹, a.] To twist about in an irregular manner. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.] weezelt, n. An old spelling of weasel.

weft¹ (wēft), n. [< ME. weft, < AS. weft, wefta (= Icel. veft, also ripta, ripta), threads woven into and crossing the warp; with formative -t, < weftan, weave: see weave¹.] 1. The threads, taken together, which run across the web from side to side, or from selva to selva. Also called woof.

The weft was so called from its being "wafted" in and out of the warp; it is also often called the woof, though more correctly the woof is the same as the web or finished stuff. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 206.

2. In bot., a name sometimes given to a felt-like stratum produced in certain fungi by abundant closely interwoven hyphae.

The peripheral portion of the delicate hyphal weft.

De Bary, Fungi (trans.), p. 217.

weft², n. An obsolete form of the preterit and past participle of weave¹.

Ne can thy irrevocable destiny bee wefte.

Spenser, F. Q., III. iv. 36.

weft³, n. Same as waft.

weft⁴ (wēft), n. A dialectal form of waft, 3.

The strongest sort of smells are best in a weft afar off.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 833.

weftage¹ (wēft'āj), n. [< weft¹ + -age.] Texture; the style or quality of the web, as of any textile fabric.

The whole muscles, as they lie upon the bones, might be truly tanned, whereby the weftage of the fibres might more easily be observed. Grey, Museum. (Latham.)

weft-fork (wēft'fōrk), n. 1. A device employed in some looms to lay in, piece by piece, a filling of slats, whalebone, palm-leaf, or other stiffening material.—2. An early arrangement for stopping a loom in case of the failure of the weft-thread. It is essentially a weighted lever, which is supported by the weft-thread, and performs its action by falling in the event of the breakage or failure of the thread.

weft-hook (wēft'hōk), n. A tool used to draw the filling through the warp in some kinds of hand-weaving, as in slat-weaving and some narrow-ware weaving or ribbon-weaving.

wegget, n. A Middle English form of wedge¹.

weght, weigh³, n. See wie.

weght, n. See wieht.

weghtnest, n. Same as wightness.

wegheet, n. See wieght.

wegheld, wegheldt, n. See wergild.

wehrlite (wēr'lit), n. [Named after Aloys Wehrle, an Austrian metallurgist and mining official (1791-1835).] A mineral obtained from Deutsch-Wilfen, in Hungary, in steel-gray folia with bright metallic luster and high specific gravity (8.4). It consists essentially of bismuth and tellurium, and some analyses show the presence of a small amount of silver. It is allied to tetramine, but its exact composition is uncertain, and it is possible that more than one species may be included under the name.

wehr-wolf, n. See werwolf.

weilt, n. An old spelling of way.

weibeyte, n. A rare duo-carbonate of the metals of the cerium group, occurring in minute white crystals in southern Norway.

weid (wēd), n. Same as weed³.

Weierstrassian (vī-ēr-stras'i-an), a. Of or pertaining to, or named from, K. T. W. Weierstrass, a German mathematician (born 1816).

—Weierstrassian function. (a) One of the functions used in Weierstrass's method of treating elliptic functions. (b) The function

$$fz = \sum_{n=0}^{\infty} b_n \cos(\pi n z) \pi z.$$

In certain cases, as when $p = 1$, $b < 1$, $ab = 1 + \frac{2}{3}\pi$, this function, although continuous, has no differential coefficient. In fact, the curve of the function, when seen at a distance, appears like a simple curve of sines; but when it is magnified, small waves are seen upon it; under a higher magnifying power, wavelets on these waves; and so on ad infinitum, so that, although $f(z + h) - f(z)$ becomes infinitesimal with h , yet it has no limiting ratio to h .

Weigelia (wī-jē'li-ä), n. [Properly Wiegelia: named for C. E. Weigel, a German botanist.] See Diervilla.

Weigert's method. The method of tracing the course of the medullated nerve-fibers by hardening and staining them.

weigh¹ (wā), v. [Early mod. E. also way; < ME. weien, weien, wezen (pret. wei, wai, wege, weie, waght, pp. weien, wege, weie, warin). < AS. weigan (pret. weg, pp. wegen), carry, bear, also intr. move, = OFries. wega, wiea = MD. weghen, D. wegen, weigh, = OHG. wegon, MHG. wegon, move, G. wegen in comp. bewegen, move, also in var. forms wiegen, rock, wägen, weigh, = Icel. regna, move, carry, lift, weigh, = Sw. räga, weigh, = Dan. veie, weigh, = Goth. gawigan, move, shake about, = OBulg. resti, go, move, = L. rehare, carry, = Gr. ἵκω, ἔλκω = Skt.

And so ye same morning we wayde our ancre and made sayle, and come into the foresayd haven at Mylo.

Sir R. Gygforde, Fylkrymige, p. 63.

[The ship] struck upon a rock, and, being forced to run ashore to save her men, could never be weighed since, although she lies a great height above the water.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 3.

2. To bear up or balance in order to determine the weight of; determine the relative heaviness of (something) by comparison in a balance with some recognized standard; ascertain the number of pounds, ounces, etc., in: as, to weigh sugar; to weigh gold.

Like stuffe haue I read in S. Francis Legend, of the balance wherein mens deedes are weighed, and the Deuill lost his prey by the weight of a Chalice.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 140.

The hunter took up his rifle instinctively from the corner of the room, weighed it in both hands held palm upward.

W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 297.

3. To consider or examine for the purpose of forming an opinion or coming to a conclusion; compare; estimate deliberately and maturely; balance; ponder: as, to weigh the advantages and disadvantages of a scheme.

In noble corage ought been areste,
And weyen every thing by equitee.

Chaucer, Good Women, l. 398.

Wherefore I pray you weigh this with yourself the better, and see whether you can espy how your doctrine is doubtful.

J. Bradford, Letters (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 130.

Regard not who it is which speaketh, but weigh only what is spoken.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, Pref., i.

Weigh oath with oath, and you will nothing weigh.

Shak., M. N. D., iii. 2. 131.

4. To consider as worthy of notice; make account of; care for; regard; esteem.

You weigh me not? O, that's you care not for me.

Shak., L. L. L., v. 2. 27.

You are light, gentlemen,

Nothing to weigh your hearts.

Fletcher and Shirley, Night-Walker, l. 1.

5. To overweigh or overpower; burden; oppress. See the following phrase.—To weigh down. (a) To preponderate over.

He weighs King Richard down.

Shak., Rich. II., iii. 4. 89.

(b) To oppress with weight or heaviness; overburden; depress.

Thou [sleep] no more wilt weigh my eyelids down.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iii. 1. 7.

II. intrans. 1. To weigh anchor; get under way or in readiness to sail.

When he was aboard his bark, he weighed and set sail, and shot off all his guns.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, II. 232.

The vessel weighs, forsakes the shore,

And lessens to the sight.

Cowper, The Bird's Nest.

2. To have weight, literally or figuratively.

Alliances, how near soever, weigh but light in the Scales of State.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 117.

3. To be or amount in heaviness or weight; be of equal effect with in the balance: as, a nugget weighs several ounces; a load which weighs two tons. The terms expressing the weight are in the adverbial objective. That which a balance measures is the proportionate acceleration of masses toward the center of the earth. This is equal to their proportionate masses; and mass is the important quantity determined. The weight, or attraction of gravitation (less the centrifugal force), differs at different stations, and is not determined by the operation of weighing.

And the Frensch kyng gaue hym a goblet of sylver weygn liii. marke.

Berners, tr. of Froissart's Chron., II. lxxxvii.

Master Featherstone, O Master Featherstone, you may now make your fortunes weigh ten stone of feathers more than ever they did!

Dekker and Webster, Northward Ho, v. 1.

4. To be considered as important; have weight in the intellectual balance.

He finds . . . that the same argument which weighs with him has weighed with thousands . . . before him.

Ep. Atterbury, Sermons, II. ii.

Such considerations never weigh with them.

Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, xci.

5. To bear heavily; press hard.

Cleane the stuff'd bosom of that perilous stuff

Which weighs upon the heart.

Shak., Macbeth, v. 3. 45.

6. To consider; reflect.

My tongue was never oild with "Here, an't like you,"

"There, I beseech you"; weigh, I am a soldier,

And truth I covet only, no fine terms, sir.

Fletcher, Loyal Subject, li. 1.

The soldiers, less weighing because less knowing, clamoured to be led on against any danger.

Milton, Hist. Eng., ii.

To weigh down, to sink by its own weight or burden.

The softness of the stalk, which maketh the bough, being over-loaded, . . . weigh down.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 610.

To weigh in, in sporting, to ascertain one's weight before the contest.

White Melville, White Rose, l. xiv.

*weigh*¹ (wā), n. [*< weigh*¹, v.] A certain quantity or measure, estimated by weight; a measure of weight (compare way): in the South Wales coal-fields, a weight of ten tons.

*weigh*² (wā), n. A misspelling of *way*¹, in the phrase under way, due to confusion with the phrase to weigh anchor.

We lost no time in getting under weigh again.

B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 230.

*weigh*³, n. See weigh.

weighable (wā'a-bl), a. [*< weigh*¹ + -able.] Capable of being weighed.

weighage (wā'āj), n. [*< weigh*¹ + -age.] A rate or toll paid for the weighing of goods.

Imp. Dict.

weigh-bauk (wā'bāk), n. The beam of a balance; hence, in the plural, a pair of scales.

[Scotch.]

Capering in the air in a pair of weigh-bauks, now up, now down.

Scott, Redgauntlet, xxiv. (Rhyme Dict.)

weigh-beam (wā'bēm), n. A weighing-scale carried by a wooden or iron horse, for convenience in weighing freight at a dock or railroad-station; a portable scale used by custom-house weighers, etc.

weigh-board (wā'bōrd), n. In mining. See way-board.

weigh-bridge (wā'brij), n. A weighing-machine for weighing carts, wagons, etc., with their load.

weigh-can (wā'kan), n. A reservoir from which supplies are drawn, so connected with a scale that any desired weight may be conveniently drawn out.

weighed (wād), a. Balanced; experienced.

A young man not weighed in state matters.

Bacon.

weigher (wā'ēr), n. [< ME. weyere (= M.L.G. weiger); *< weigh*¹ + -er.] 1. One who or that which weighs: an officer whose duty it is to weigh commodities or test weights.—2. The equator.

This same circle is cleped also the weyere (equator) of the day, for, when the some is in the hevedes of Aries and Libra, than ben the daies and the nyhtes illike of lengthe in the world.

Chaucer, Astrolabe, i. sec. 17.

Sacker and weigher. See sacker.

weighership (wā'ēr-ship), n. [< weigher + -ship.] The office of weigher.

weigh-house (wā'hous), n. A building (generally of a public character) at or in which goods are weighed by suitable apparatus.

He shall, with an hour's lying in the pulpit, get enough to find thirty or forty sturdy lubbers a month long, of which the weakest shall be as strong in the belly, when he cometh unto the manger, as the mightiest porter in the weigh house.

Tyndale, Ans. to Sir T. More, etc. (Parker Soc., 1850), p. 76.

weighing (wā'ing), n. [< ME. weygnge, weygnge; verbal n. of *weigh*¹, v.] 1. The act of ascertaining weight.—2. As much as is weighed at once: as, a weighing of beef. Imp. Dict.—3. Same as weighing.

weighing-cage (wā'ing-kāj), n. A cage in which living animals, as pigs, sheep, and calves, may be conveniently weighed.

weighing-house (wā'ing-hous), n. Same as weigh-house.

weighing-machine (wā'ing-ma-shēn), n. Any contrivance by which the weight of an object may be ascertained, as the common balance, spring-balance, steelyard, etc.

See cuts under balance and steelyard. The term is, however, generally applied only to those contrivances which are employed for ascertaining the weight of heavy bodies, as the machines for the purpose of determining the weights of laden vehicles, machines for weighing cattle, machines for weighing heavy goods, as large casks, bales, etc.

The hydrostatic weighing-machine (see cut) consists essentially of a strong cylinder within which moves a tightly packed piston, the space being filled with castor-oil; the loop above is attached to the cylinder and the ring below to the piston. When the object to be weighed is hung on the ring, the piston presses on the oil, and this passes by a channel to a gage which indicates by the motion of the index on the dial the weight in pounds and tons.

weighing-scoop (wā'ing-skōp), n. A combined scoop and spring-balance. The spring is in the handle of the scoop, and while the scoop is being filled the spring is held in place by a stop controlled by the thumb. On raising the loaded scoop the stop is released, and the weight of the contents is indicated on the handle. E. H. Knight.

weigh-lock (wā'lok), n. A canal-lock at which barges are weighed and their tonnage is settled.

weighman (wā'man), n.; pl. weighmen (-men). A weigher. [Rare.]

Two weeks after the coopers' strike came the strike of the lightermen and weighmen.

U. S. Cons. Rep., No. 14v, (1886), p. 266.

weigh-shaft (wā'shaft), n. In a steam-engine, a rocking-shaft or rocker-shaft.

*weight*¹ (wā't), n. [Formerly also weight; < ME. weicht, weichte, weicht, weight, wight, wight; < AS. gewiht, weight; = M.L.G. wicht, gewicht = D. gewicht = O.H.G. gewicht, M.H.G. gewicht, gewichte, G. gewicht, weight; = Icel. ratt = Sw. ragt = Dan. rægt, weight; with formative -t, < AS. wegan, etc., raise, lift: see *weigh*¹. The reg. mod. form would be wight (parallel with wight, sight, etc.); the present vowel-form is due to conformity with the verb *weigh*¹.]

1. Downward force of a body; gravity; heaviness; ponderousness; more exactly, the resultant of the force of the earth's gravitation and of the centrifugal pressure from its axis of rotation, considered as a property of the body affected by it.

Considerable confusion has existed between weight and mass, the latter being the quantity of matter as measured by the ratio of the momentum of a body to its velocity. Weight, in this the proper sense of the word, is something which varies with the latitude of the station at which the heavy body is, being greater by $\frac{1}{60}$ of itself at the poles than at the equator; it also varies considerably with the elevation above the sea ($\frac{1}{16}$ for every kilometer). The weights of different bodies at one and the same station were proved, by Newton's experiments with pendulums of different material, to be in the ratio of their masses, and irrespective of their chemical composition; consequently, a balance which shows the equality of weight of two bodies at one station also shows the equality of their masses. In determining the specific gravity of a body, it is hung by a fine thread to one pan of the balance, and immersed completely in water. The reduced number of pounds, ounces, etc., which is required in the other pan to balance the first, under these circumstances, is called the weight of the body in water. In like manner, we speak of the weight in air and the weight in water. These expressions forbid our conceiving of weight as synonymous with the quantity of matter; and yet, when a pound is said to be a unit of weight, although it is intended to be carried up mountains and to distant places, mass, or quantity of matter, must be understood, since there is no important quantity but the quantity of matter which a pound or a kilogram measures. The confusion is increased when the pound is defined, as it still is in the United States, by the weight of a certain standard in air, without reference to the height of the barometer and thermometer. In the older books on mechanics, a pound is taken as a force, and the quantity of matter is obtained by dividing the weight by the measure of gravity; but now both the theoretical books and the legal definitions of the standards used in weighing make the pound, kilo, etc., to be masses, or quantities of matter, whose weight is obtained by multiplying them by the acceleration of gravity at any station. Nevertheless, the older system still finds a few supporters. It was long after Galileo had firmly established the law of falling bodies before it occurred to anybody that weight was a force. Gravity, so far as common observation shows, draws bodies to the earth alone, and that in parallel lines, and Galileo had shown that it accelerates all bodies alike, whether they are great or small, so that there was nothing to suggest the idea of force, especially as that idea was then in its infancy, and had not attained its present prominence in the minds of men. Weight in those days being looked upon as a property of single bodies, and not as subsisting between pairs of bodies, was necessarily confounded with mass; and a mental inertia, or natural clinging to old conceptions, kept up the confusion after Newton had demonstrated the true law of gravitation. For the units of weight, see def. 5. Abbreviated wt.

Atlas that I bilicite
Of pured gold a thousand pound of weight.

Chaucer, Franklin's Tale, l. 832.

So Belgian mounds bear on their shattered sides
The sea's whole weight, increased with swelling tides.

Addison, The Campaign.

Though a pound or a gramme is the same all over the world, the weight of a pound or a gramme is greater in high latitudes than near the equator.

Clerk Maxwell, Matter and Motion, Art. xlvii.

2. Mass; relative quantity of matter.—3. A heavy mass; specifically, something used on account of its weight or its mass. Thus, the usefulness of the weights that a man holds in his hands in leaping or jumping lies in the addition they impart to his momentum, and their dragging him down is a disadvantage; but the weights of a clock are for giving a downward pull, and their momentum is practically nothing.

A man leapeth better with weights in his hands than without.

Both men and women in Cochiti account it a great Gal-lantrie to haue wide eates, which therefore they stretch by arte, hanging weights on them till they reach to their shoulders.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 494.

Hydrostatic Weighing machine.

Impartial Justice holds her equal scales,

Prior, Ode to the Queen, st. 10.

When I said I would match you, I meant with even weight; you ride four stone lighter than I. Very well, but I cannot sit to carry weight. Scott, Rob Roy, iii.

4. Specifically, a body of determinate mass, intended to be used on a balance or scale for measuring the weight or mass of the body in the other pan or part of the scale (as the platform in a platform-scale). — 5. A system of units for expressing the weight or mass of bodies. Avoirdupois weight is founded on the avoirdupois pound (see pound), which is equal to 437.592625 grams. It is divided into 16 ounces, and each ounce into 16 drams; 112 (in the United States commonly 100) pounds make a hundredweight, and 20 hundredweights a ton. (See ton.) The stone is 14 pounds. Troy weight is founded on the troy pound, which is 373.242 grams. It is divided into 12 ounces, each ounce into 20 pennyweights, and each pennyweight into 24 grains. But formerly the pennyweight was divided into 32 real grains. There was also an ideal subdivision of the grain into 20 mites, each of 24 droites, each of 20 perits, each of 24 blanks. The goldsmiths also divided the ounce troy into 24 carats of 4 grains each for gold and silver, and into 15 carats of 4 grains each for diamonds. Troy weight, formerly employed for many purposes, is now only used for gold and silver. Apothecaries' weight, still used in the United States for dispensing medicine, divides the troy ounce into 8 drams, each dram into 3 scruples, and each scruple into 20 grains, which are identical with troy grains. For weight in the metric system, see metric.
6. Pressure; burden; care; responsibility.

A wise chieftain never trusts the weight
Of the execution of a brave exploit

But unto those whom he most honoureth.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, l. 7.

Sage he stood,
With Atlantean shoulders, fit to bear
The weight of mightiest monarchies.

Milton, P. L., ii. 367.

Why does that lovely Head, like a fair Flow'r Oppress'd with Drops of a hard-falling Show'r, Bend with its Weight of Grief? Congreve, To Cynthia.

7. In coal-mining, subsidence of the roof due to pressure from above, which takes effect as the coal is worked away. In long-wall working, the weight is usually of importance, as causing the coal, after it has been holed, to "get itself" — that is, to break down without the necessity of using powder, wedges, or some thing similar. Properly, "weight" is the cause and "weighting" the result, but the two words are often used with nearly the same meaning.

8. Importance; specifically, the importance of a fact as evidence tending to establish a conclusion; efficacy; power of influencing the conduct of persons and the course of events; effective influence in general. In calculations by least squares, the weight assigned to an observation is its effect upon the result, expressed by its equivalence to a certain number of concordant observations of standard accuracy.

It happens many times that, to urge and enforce the matter we speak of, we go still mounting by degrees and increasing our speech with words or with sentences of more weight one then another, & is a figure of great both efficacy & ornament. . . . We call this figure by the Greek originally, the Anacore or figure of encrease, because every word that is spoken is one of more weight then another. Puffendorf, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 182.

For well enough they understood

The matter was of weight.

Bottle of Indolence (Child's Ballads, VII. 223).

As men are in quality and as their services are in weight for the public good, so likewise their rewards and encouragements . . . might somewhat declare how the state itself doth accept their pains.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 31.

If the people of Ireland were a united nation, it is conceivable that their demand for autonomy would have weight.

Edinburgh Rev., CLXIII. 568.

9. In med., a sensation of oppression or heaviness over the whole body or over a part of it, as the head or stomach. — Atomic weight. See atomic.

Dead weight, the pressure produced by a heavy body supported in a state of rest by anything; used literally and figuratively.

The huge dead weight of stupidity and indolence is always ready to smother audacious enquiries.

Leslie Stephen, Eng. Thought, i. § 17.

I feel so free and so clear

By the loss of that dead weight.

Tennyson, Maud, xix. 10.

Fisherman's weight. See fisherman. Gross weight, the weight as the object can be tare, impurity, or other similar condition, as contradistinguished to net or retail weight. Lazy, net, troy weight. See the qualifying words. Mercurial-weight thermometer. Same as mercurial thermometer. Specific weight, the weight of a substance, much the same.

Weight of an observation, the number of ordinary observations to which it is equivalent, as evident in the deduction of the most probable value. Compare def. 8. — Weight of a reprobant. See reprobant. Weight of metal, the weight of a capable of being thrown at one discharge from all the guns of a ship. Weight of wind, or organ-building, the degree of compression in the air furnished by the bellows to a particular stop or group of stops. The usual pressure is sufficient to raise a column of water in a U-tube about 3 inches.

weight (wā't), v. t. [< weight, n.] 1. To add or attach a weight or weights to; load with additional weight; add to the heaviness of.

Some of the [balance] poles are weighted at both ends, but ours are not. Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor.

2. In dying, to load (the threads) with minerals or other foreign matters mixed with the dyes, for the purpose of making the fabrics appear thick and heavy.

Dyes . . . is used for weighting, that is, for giving weight and apparent body and firmness to inferior goods. O'Neill, Dyeing and Calico Printing, p. 74.

3. In founding, to bind (the parts of a flask) together by means of weights placed on the top, in order to prevent the bursting of the flask under the pressure of the liquid metal.

weight (wā't), n. See weight.

weightily (wā'ti-lī), adv. In a weighty manner. (a) Heavily; ponderously. (b) With force or impressiveness; with moral power.

weightiness (wā'ti-nēs), n. The state or quality of being weighty; ponderousness; heaviness, literally or figuratively; solidity; force; importance.

The weightiness that was upon their spirits and countenances keeping down the lightness that would have been up in us. T. Elwood, Life (ed. Howells), p. 192.

The weightiness of any argument. Locke.

The weightiness of the adventure. Sir J. Hayward.

weighting (wā'ting), n. [Verbal n. of weight, v.] 1. In coal-mining, subsidence or other disturbance in a coal-mine due to "weight," or pressure of the overlying mass of rock. A mine in which such subsidence is taking place is said to be "on the weight." [Eng.]

weightless (wā'tlēs), a. [< weight + -less.] 1. Having no weight; imponderable; light.

That light and weightless down.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 5. 33.

2. Of no importance or consideration.

And so [they] are oft-times emboldened to ramle upon them as from aloft very weak and weightless discourses.

Ep. Hall, Apol. against Brownists, § 1.

weight-nail (wā't-nāl), n. In ship-building, a nail somewhat similar to a deck-nail, but not so fine, and with a square head, used for fastening cleats, etc.

weight-rest (wā't-rest), n. A form of lathe-rest which is held firmly upon the shears by a weight hung beneath. E. H. Knight.

weighty (wā'ti), a. [Early mod. E. also weightie, weighty; < weight + -y.] 1. Having considerable weight; heavy; ponderous.

Yorke, I pray you, Vnclie, giue me this Dagger. . . .

Glo. It is too weightie for your Grace to weare.

Shak., Rich. III. (fol. 1623), iii. 1.

2. Burdensome; hard to bear.

He was beholding to the Romanes, that eased him of so weightie a burthen, and lessened his cares of government.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 84.

The cares of empire are great, and the burthen which lies upon the shoulders of princes very weighty.

Ep. Atterbury, Sermons, I. viii.

3. Important; serious; momentous; grave.

Nor for no fauour sould promote thame
To that most gret and weighty cure.

Lauder, Bewtie of Kyngis (E. E. T. S.), l. 297.

This secret is so weighty 'twill require
A strong faith to conceal it.

Shak., Hen. VIII., ii. 1. 144.

My head is full of thoughts

More weighty than thy life or death can be.

Beun. and Pl. Maid's Tragedy, iii. 2.

4. Adapted to affect the judgment or to convince; forcible; cogent.

Masking the business from the common eye

For sundry weighty reasons.

Shak., Macbeth, iii. 1. 126.

Skillful diplomatists were surprised to hear the weighty observations which at seventeen the prince made on public affairs.

Macauley, Hist. Eng., vii.

5. Grave or serious in aspect or purport.

Things . . .

That bear a weighty and a serious brow.

Shak., Hen. VIII., Prolog., l. 2.

She looked upon me with a weighty countenance, and fetched a deep sigh, crying out, "O the cumber and entanglements of this vain world!"

Penn. Travels in Holland, etc.

6. Authoritative; influential; important.

The weightiest men in the weightiest stations. Swift.

The grave and weighty men who listened to him approved his words.

Baneroft, Hist. Const., II. 257.

7. Severe; rigorous; afflictive.

We banish thee for ever. . . .

If, after two days' shine, Athens contain thee,

Attend our weightier judgement.

Shak., T. of A., iii. 5. 102.

weik, n. See weik.

weil, n. Same as weik.

Weil's disease. An infectious disease, having a course of about ten days, characterized by jaundice, muscular pains, enlargement of the liver and spleen, and fever. Also called acute infectious jaundice.

welly, adv. A dialectal form of welly.

Well, I'm welly broken, as they say in Lancashire.

Swift, Polite Conversation, ii. (Davies).

Weingarten's theorem. See theorem.

Weinmannia (wīn-man'i-ā), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1763), named after J. W. Weinmann, a German apothecary.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Saxifragaceae and tribe Cunoniaceae. It is characterized by flowers with imbricated sepals, four or five petals, eight or ten long stamens inserted on the base of a free disk, and small oblong, commonly pilose seeds. There are about 60 species, principally of tropical or south temperate regions, occurring in America, Australia, New Zealand, and the Mascarene and Pacific islands. They are trees or shrubs with opposite branchlets, opposite coriaceous, often glandular leaves, odd-pinnate with a winged rachis. The small white flowers are disposed in simple terminal or axillary erect racemes, followed by small coriaceous two-celled capsules splitting into two sharp boat-like valves. Some species afford a soft light wood used in carpentry and cabinet-work. A Peruvian species yields an astringent bark utilized in tanning. W. tinctoria is employed in the Isle of Bourbon in dyeing red. W. pinatta, a tree with downy branches, native from the West Indies and Mexico to Guiana, is known in Jamaica as bastard brazil. W. Bonplandii, an evergreen tree of New South Wales, reaches 100 feet high; 4 others are Australian, and 2 occur in New Zealand, of which W. sylvestris, a small tree with blackish bark, is now cultivated in England, and W. racemosa is known as the tawai-bark tree.

weir, wear (wēr), n. [The spelling weir is irreg. and appar. Sc.; the proper spelling is weir; early mod. E. weir, weare, were, sometimes wire; < ME. wer (dat. were), < AS. wer, a weir, dam, fence, hedge, inclosure, = G. wehr, a weir, dam, dike, = Ice. vörð, a fenced-in landing-place; from the root of AS. wearian, protect, guard, defend, etc., also fence, dam; see wear.] 1. A dam erected across a river to stop and raise the water, as for the purpose of taking fish, or conveying a stream to a mill, of maintaining the water at the level required for navigating it, or for purposes of irrigation.

Half the river fell over a high weir, with all its appendages of bucks, and hatchways, and eel-baskets, into the Nun's pool. Kingsley, Yeast, iii.

2. A fence, as of twigs or stakes, set in a stream for catching fish. Weirs differ from pounds principally in being constructed, in whole or in part, of brush or of narrow boards, with or without netting; and they are sometimes arranged so that at low tide a sand-bar cuts off the escape of the fish, leaving them in a basin, and allowing them to be taken at any time before a certain stage of rise of the next tide. Weirs are of two kinds, the shoal-water weir and the deep-water weir. The shoal-water weir, as illustrated in fig. 1, has a leader L, which is a row of stakes, generally woven with brush, leading out from the shore. Its extremity is at the entrance of the big pound M. The big pond is likewise of stakes filled with brush, and its entrance 30 feet wide. This leads by a passage 5 feet wide into the little pond N, and this into the pocket O, which is a frame about 16 feet long and 10 feet wide, with sides of netting, and a board floor. The fish following the shore meet the leader, turn and follow it into the big pond; here they follow the side around until they pass into the little pond, and from that into the pocket, where they are left by the receding tide and taken out at low water. The deep-water weir (fig. 2) has a similar leader A, extending to the entrance of the big pond, or heart, B, beyond which are the small pond C and the bowl D, into which the fish finally go. The form of the inclosures in both cases leads the fish constantly forward, and they rarely or never find their way back through the passages. In both figures E represents the land or high-water mark, and F the low-water mark.

The day following we came to Chippannam, where the people were fed, but their wires afforded us fish.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 90.

Deep-water weir. See def. 2. — Dry weir, a weir on a flat which is left bare at ebb-tide. — Half-tide weir, a fish-weir so placed that the fish taken can be removed at half-ebb or half-tide, without waiting for low tide, as is generally done. — Lock-weir, a weir having a lock-chamber and gates. E. H. Knight. — Shoal-water weir. See def. 2. — Slat weir. See slat.

weiranglet, n. Same as warrianglet. Willughby.
weird (wērd), n. [Formerly also wierd; < ME. wērd, wērd, wīrd, wērd, wērd, < AS. wērd, wīrd, wīrd, destiny, fate, also, personified, one of the Fates (= OS. wārth = MD. wrd, wrth = OHG. wurt, MHG. wurth, fate, death, = Ice. urthr, fate, one of the three Norns or Fates), < weorðan (pret. pl. worðan), etc., become, happen; see worth. weld¹, v. t. A Middle English form of wield.
weldability (wel'da-bil'i-ti), n. [< weldable + -ity (see -ibility).] Capability of being welded.

The above-mentioned elements harden malleable iron, and probably affect its weldability by their ready oxidability. W. H. Greenwood, Steel and Iron, p. 8.

weldable (wel'da-bl), a. [< weld¹ + -able.] Capable of being welded.

weld-bore (wel'd'bör), n. A kind of woollen cloth made at Bradford, in Yorkshire, England. Dict. of Needlework.

welder¹ (wel'dër), n. [< weld² + -er¹.] One who welds, or an instrument or appliance for welding.

welder², n. An obsolete form of wielder.

welding-heat (wel'ding-hët), n. See heat.

welding-machine (wel'ding-mä-shén'), n. A machine by which the edges of plates previously bent are joined. The edges are made to lap inside a chamber, and are exposed to a gas-flame, whence the joint is passed beneath a gang of rolls or a hammer.

welding-powder (wel'ding-pou'dër), n. A flux for use in heating metal for welding, consisting of a calcined powder formed from borax and other ingredients.

The steel to be welded . . . is then dipped into the welding powder, and again placed in the fire.

Workshop Receipts, 1st ser., p. 361.

welding-swage (wel'ding-swäj), n. A block or a fulling-tool used in closing a welded joint. E. H. Knight.

weld-iron (wel'd'irn), n. A name sometimes applied to wrought-iron. This name was recommended by an international committee appointed by the American Institute of Mining Engineers, but has not been generally adopted; indeed the institute did not accept the report of its committee in so far as this modification of the established nomenclature of iron is concerned.

weldless (wel'd'less), a. [< weld + less.] Having no welds; made without welding.

It is their intention to lay down plant for the construction of boilers built up of weldless rings.

The Engineer, LXIX, 267.

weld-steel (wel'd'stël), n. Puddled steel. This name was suggested by a committee appointed by the American Institute of Mining Engineers, but has not been generally adopted.

weldy (wel'di), a. An obsolete or dialectal form of wieldy.

weler. A Middle English form of weal, welld².

weloful, a. Another spelling of wealful.

weluw, v. A Middle English form of wallow².

First a man groweth as dooth a gras.

And anon after weluweth as flouris of hay.

Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 173.

welfare (wel'fär), n. [< ME. wel fare (= MLG. walvare); < well² + fare¹.] 1. A state or condition of doing well; prosperous or satisfactory course or relation; exemption from evil; state with respect to well-being; as, to promote the physical or the spiritual welfare of society; to inquire after a friend's welfare; to be anxious about the welfare of a ship at sea.

My daughter's welfare I do feare.

The Merchant's Daughter (Child's Ballads, IV, 332).

He [James H.] seems to have determined to make some amends for neglecting the welfare of his own soul by taking care of the souls of others. Maceday, Hist. Eng., vi.

A natural source of water; a place where water springs up in or issues from the ground; a spring or well-spring; a fountain. As soon as a spring begins to be utilized as a source of water-supply it is more or less thoroughly transformed into a well. (See def. 4.) This is necessary, both for rendering the access to it convenient, and for giving the water a chance to accumulate and be protected when not needed for use. Hence the word spring is much used by geologists in describing the natural sources of water-supply, and well, by those indicating the manner in which the supply has been made available. There is, however, no sharp distinction possible between the two words. Thus, Prestwich speaks of the "beautiful spring [between Cirencester and Cheltenham] known as the Seven Wells," and Phillips of a "feeble intermittent spring [issuing from Giggleswick Scar, in Yorkshire] known as the Ebbing and Flowing Well."

Dan Chaucer, well of English undefeild.

Spenser, F. Q., IV, ii, 32.

3. That which flows or springs out or up from a source; water or other fluid issuing forth.

And from his gored head a well of blood did gush.

Spenser, F. Q., l, iii, 35.

The water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life. John, iv, 14.

4. A pit, hole, or shaft sunk in the ground, either by digging or by boring through earth and rock, to obtain a supply of water, or of other fluid, as mineral water, brine, petroleum, or natural gas, from a subterranean source, and walled or otherwise protected from caving in. Wells are generally cylindrical, and are sometimes bored to a depth of several hundreds or thousands of feet. (See Artesian well, under Artesian. See also oil-well, tube well.) From ordinary wells for domestic use the water is raised in vessels — generally buckets hung in pairs to a windlass or singly to a well-sweep — or, as from deeper wells, by pumping.

'Tis not so deep as a well, nor so wide as a church-door; but 'tis enough. Shak., R. and J., iii, l, 99.

Specifically — (a) In a building, a compartment or shaft extending through the different floors, or from top to bottom, in which the stairs are placed, or round which they turn; or one in which an elevator or lift moves up and down; or one which serves for the admission of air or light to interior rooms, etc. The kinds of well named are distinctively called a well-staircase or (for the space interior to the stairs) a well hole, an elevator-shaft, and an air- or light-shaft. (b) In a ship: (1) A compartment formed by bulkheads round the pumps, for their protection and for ease of access to them. (2) A shaft through which to raise and lower an auxiliary screw-propeller. (3) The cockpit. (c) In a fishing-vessel or on a float, a compartment with a perforated bottom for the admission of water, in which fish are kept alive; distinctively called live-well. (d) In an auxiliary mine, a shaft with branches or galleries running out from it. (e) In a furnace, the lower part of the cavity into which the metal falls. (f) In an Irish jamming-car, the hollow space for luggage between the seats. (g) In some breech-loading small arms, a cavity for the breech-block in the rear of the chamber. (h) In an English court of law, the inclosed space for the lawyers and their assistants, immediately in front of the judges' bench.

Absorbing-well. See absorb. — Artesian well. See Artesian (with cut). — Driven well, or drive-well. See tube-well. — Flowing well. See flowing. — Negative well. Same as absorbing-well. — The wells, or Wells, in England, wells or springs of mineral waters, or a place where such wells are situated; as, to drink of or go to the wells at Bath; Timbridge Wells.

The New Wells at Epsom, with variety of Ruffling Shops, will be opened on Easter Monday next.

Quoted in Ashtou's Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, II, 113.

— Syn. 4. Well, Spring, Fountain, Cistern. A well is an artificial pit sunk to such a depth that water comes into the bottom and rises to the water-level, ready to be drawn up. A spring is a place where water comes naturally to the surface of the ground and flows away; a spring may be opened or struck in excavation, but cannot be made. A fountain is characterized by the leaping upward of the water; it may be natural, and thus be a kind of spring, or it may be artificial, as in a public square. A cistern is an artificial receptacle for the storage of water, as that which is conducted from roofs; figuratively, the word may be applied to similar natural subterranean reservoirs.

Welwitschia (wel-wich'i-ä), n. [NL. (J. D. Hooker, 1863), named after Friedrich Welwitsch (1806-72), an Austrian botanist and traveler.] A genus of gymnospermous plants, of the order Gnetaceae, among the most remarkable in the vegetable kingdom, distinguished by dioecious many-flowered imbricated cone-like spikes panicle at the margin of a short woody trunk. The only species, W. mirabilis, is a native of sandy regions of southwestern tropical Africa, in Benguela and Namaland, between 14° and 23° south latitude.

Welwitschia mirabilis.

1. Entire plant. 2. Branch of the panicle. a. stamen—tube laid open, showing the enclosed ovule; b. pollen-grains; c. scale of cone with flower bud; d. seed, longitudinal section, showing the calyptriform integument at its apex; e. ripe seed and base of pericarp; f. pericarp with styliform apex of the integument of the seed; g. embryo.

Its thick trunk bears but two leaves. The original cotyledons, which are opposite, green, spreading, and persistent, are composed of a hard fibrous substance, and become often 6 feet long and 2 or 3 wide. They finally split into long shreds, but are still retained, it is said, through over a hundred years of growth. The mature trunk forms a tabular mass only about a foot high, but 5 or 6 feet across; the top is truncate, hard, pitted, and broken by cracks, and resembles a fungus of the genus Polyporus; the base is deeply sunk in the soil, and produces middle-sized roots. The panicle inflorescence is composed of rigid erect dichotomously jointed stems from 6 to 12 inches high, with two opposite scales sheathing each joint, and is developed annually from the upper side of the trunk at the base of the cotyledons. The flower-spikes are composed of brilliant scarlet scales overlapping, usually in four rows—the male with spikes 1½ inches long or under, the female larger, fewer, and thicker. Each scale contains a flower, the male a small loose membranous perianth, the filaments connate into a loosely exerted tube, and six anthers, each opening by three apical and finally confluent pores. The fruit is dry, two-winged, compressed, inclosed in a fibrous urtic. The new growth is chiefly horizontal, enlarging the stem both above and below the base of the leaf, which finally projects from a deep marginal cavity.

welyt, a. [ME., < AS. welīg, welīg (= OHG. welag), rich, wealthy, < wela, wealth: see welal.] In a state of wealth or good health; healthy.

MHG. wergelt, G. wergeld, wergeld), < wer, a man, + geld, gild, gylt, retribution, compensation: see *wer*¹ and geld, n., *geld*², *gild*².] In Anglo-Saxon and ancient Teutonic law, a kind of fine for manslaughter and other crimes against the person, by paying which the offender freed himself from every further obligation or punishment. The fine or compensation due by the offender varied in amount according to his rank or station and that of the person killed or injured, and also according to the nature of the injury. It was in general paid to the relatives of him who had been slain, or, in the case of a wound or other bodily harm, to the person who sustained the injury; but, if the cause was brought before the community the plaintiff received only part of the fine, the community, or the king when there was one, receiving the remainder.

weriet, v. and n. A Middle English form of *wear*².

Piers Plowman (B), iii. 179.

Thus sai-to, werard, God give the mischance, Chaucer, Prologue to Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 290 (in some MSS.).

Wernerian (wēr-nēr-i-an), a. and n. [Werner (see def.) + -ian.] 1. a. Partaking of or in conformity with the views of Abraham Gottlob Werner (1750-1817), a German geologist, professor in the mining-school of Freiberg, Saxony, who had much influence on the development of geology at the time when this branch of science began to be seriously studied. He was the principal expounder of the so-called Neptunian theory of the earth's formation according to which the earth was originally covered by a chaotic ocean which held the materials of all the rocks in solution, and from which ocean the various formations were precipitated one after another.

The Wernerian notion of the aqueous precipitation of "Trap" has since that date never held up its head.

G. P. Serape, Geol. and Extinct Volcanos of Central France, Pref., p. ix.

II. n. In geol., an advocate of the Wernerian theory.

My two friends agreed with me in the opinion that the error of the Wernerians in undervaluing, or rather despising altogether as of no appreciable value, the influence of volcanic forces in the production of the rocks that compose the surface of the globe formed a fatal bar to the progress of sound geological science which it was above all things desirable to remove.

G. P. Serape, Geol. and Extinct Volcanos of Central France, Pref., p. vi.

Neptune had failed to extinguish the torch of Pluto, and the Wernerians were retreating before the Huttonians. Nature, XLII. 218.

wernerite (wēr'nēr-īt), n. [Werner (see Wernerian) + -ite.] A variety of scapolite.

Werner's map-projection. See projection.

Wernicke's fissure. The exoccipital fissure of the cerebrum; one of the so-called ape-fissures, found in apes as well as in man.

werowancet, n. [Amer. Ind.] An Indian chief.

A Werowance is a military officer, who of course takes upon him the command of all parties, either of hunting, travelling, warring, or the like, and the word signifies a war-captain. Beverly, Virginia, iii. ¶ 45.

The Indians were also deprived of the power of choosing their own chief or werowance. E. D. Neill, Virginia Carolana, viii.

werret. A Middle English form of *war*¹, *war*².

Wertherian (wēr-tēr-i-an), a. [Werther, the hero of Goethe's romance, "Die Leiden des jungen Werther" ("The Sorrows of Young Werther"), a type of the sentimental young German, + -ian.] Resembling the character of Werther; characteristic of the sentiments and modes of thought exemplified by Werther.

A love-lorn swain, . . . full of imaginary sorrows and Wertherian grief. Trollope, Barchester Towers. (Hooper.)

Wertherism (wēr-tēr-izm), n. [Werther (see Wertherian) + -ism.] Wertherian sentiment.

The romance of Jacobinism which thrilled in Shelley, the romance of Wertherism which glowed with sullen fire in Byron, are extinct as poetic impulses.

Edinburgh Rev., CLXIII. 468.

wervelst, n. pl. An obsolete form of warrels.

werwolf, werewolf (wēr'-, wēr'wulf), n.; pl.

wervolves, werewolves (-wūlvz). [Also wch-rwolves and formerly warwolf: prop. werewolf, < ME. werwolf (pl. wervolves), < AS. werwolf, also erroneously werewolf, a werwolf (also used as an epithet of the devil) (= MD. werewolf, werwolf, weywolf, wederwolf, D. warwolf = MLG. wervulf, werwolf, warwolf = MHG. werwolf, G. werwolf, also erroneously wahwolf = Sw. varulf = Dan. varulv, werwolf: cf. OF. wareul, garoul, F. garou (in comp. loup-garou), dial. gairon, raion, etc., ML. gerulphus, garulphus, < Teut.), lit. 'man-wolf' (tr. Gr. ζωειθροπος, > ML. lycanthropus, > E. lycanthropus), < wer, man, + wulf, wolf: see *wer*¹ and wolf.] In old superstition, a human being turned into a wolf while retaining human intelligence. This transformation was either voluntarily assumed, through infernal aid, for the gratification of cannibalism or other beastly propensities, or inflicted by means of witchcraft; and it might be made and unmade at its subject's will in the former case, or be either temporary or permanent in the latter. A voluntary werewolf was the most dangerous of all creatures, and trials of men on charge of crimes committed while in this form took place in Europe as late as the seventeenth century. But an involuntary werewolf might retain humane feelings and sympathies, and act beneficently as the protector of persons in distress or otherwise; and many medieval legends are based upon this idea. The former belief in werewolves throughout Europe (not yet entirely extinct in regions where wolves still abound) has given the general name lycanthropy to belief in the metamorphosis of men into beasts of any kind (generally the most destructive or obnoxious of the locality), prevalent among nearly all savage and semi-civilized peoples.

Sir Marroque, the good knight that was betrayed by his wife, for shee made him well a seven years a werwolf.

Sir T. Malory, Mort d'Arthur, III. cxxxix.

About the field religiously they went,
With hollowing charms the werwolf thence to fray,
That them and theirs awaited to betray.

Drayton, Man in the Moon.

In the old doctrine of Werewolves, not yet extinct in Europe, men who are versipelles or turnskins have the actual faculty of jumping out of their skins, to become for a time wolves. E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, I. 77.

werwolfish, werewolfish (wēr'-, wēr'wūlf'ish), a. [werwolf + -ish.] Like a werwolf; ly-canthropic; having or exhibiting the appearance or propensities attributed to werewolves.

werwolfism, werewolfism (wēr'-, wēr'wūlf'-izm), n. [werwolf + -ism.] Lycanthropy; also, the body of tradition and belief on that subject.

English folklore is singularly barren of were-wolf stories. . . . The traditional belief in were-wolfism must, however, have remained long in the popular mind, . . . for the word occurs in old ballads and romances.

S. Baring-Gould, Book of Were-Wolves, viii.

weryangle, n. Same as warriangle.

Westphal balance. A form of balance used in determining the specific gravity of solutions and also of mineral fragments. In the case of fragments a "heavy solution" is first obtained, in which they just float. The balance consists of a bar supported on a fulcrum near the middle, and having one half of it, from whose extremity hangs a sinker, graduated into ten parts. The sinker is immersed in the liquid under experiment, and then riders are hung at suitable points on the bar until it is brought back into a horizontal position as indicated by the fixed scale at the other end. The position and size of the riders give the means of reading off at once the required specific gravity without calculation.

Westphal-Erb symptom. Same as Westphal's symptom. See symptom.

Westphalian (west-fā'li-an), a. and n. [Cf. Westphalia (see def.) + -an.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to Westphalia, a province of Prussia, bordering on Hanover, the Rhenish Province, the Netherlands, etc. Westphalia was formerly a duchy, and (with larger territory) a Napoleonic kingdom from 1807 to 1813.

The Westphalian treaties, which terminated the thirty years' war, were finally signed on Oct. 24, 1648.

Amer. Cyc., XVI. 570.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Westphalia.

Westphal's foot-phenomenon. A series of rhythmic contractions of the calf-muscles following a sudden pushing up of the toes and ball of the foot, thereby putting the tendo Achillis on the stretch; ankle-clonus.

Westphal's symptom. See symptom.

westre, v. t. An old form of west.

Westringia (wes'trin'ji-ä), n. [NL. (Sir J. E. Smith, 1798), named after J. P. Westring, a physician of Linköping, Sweden, who died in 1833.]

A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Labiate and tribe Prostantheræ. It is characterized by a calyx with five equal teeth, a corolla with the upper lip flatish, and anther-connectives without an appendage. There are 9 or 11 species, all natives of extra-tropical Australia. They are shrubs with small entire leaves in whorls of three or four together, and sessile or short-pedicelled twin flowers scattered in the axils of the leaves, or rarely crowded in leafy terminal heads. W. rosemarinifolia, the Victorian rosemary, an evergreen shrub growing about 8 feet high, is sometimes cultivated.

West-Virginian (west-vér-jin'i-an), a. and n. 1. a. Of or pertaining to West Virginia, one of the United States, set apart from Virginia during the civil war, and admitted to the Union in 1863.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of West Virginia.

westward (west'wärd), adv. [Cf. ME. westward; < AS. westeard, westeard, westward, < west, west, + -ward, E. -ward.] 1. Toward the west; in a westerly direction: as, to ride or sail westward.

Westward the course of empire takes its way.

Bp. Berkeley, Arts and Learning in America.

2. Toward the ecclesiastical west. See west.

Mass is celebrated by the priest standing behind the altar with his face westward.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 105.

Westward ho! to the west: an old cry of London watermen on the Thames in hailing passengers bound westward, taken as the title of a play by Dekker and Webster and of a novel by Charles Kingsley.

*Oh! There lies your way, due west.
Then westward-ho!*

Shak., T. N., iii. 1. 146.

westward (west'wärd), a. [< westward, adv.] Being toward the west; bearing or tending westward: as, a westward position or course; the westward trend of the mountains.

westwardly (west'wärd-li), a. [< westward + -ly]. Bearing toward or from the west; west-erly. [Rare.]

On the 19th, the [ice]-pack was driven in by a westwardly wind, and . . . this open space was closed.

C. F. Hall, Polar Expedition, p. 259.

westwardly (west'wärd-li), adv. [< westwardly, a.] In a direction bearing toward the west: as, to pass westwardly.

westwards (west'wärdz), adv. [*< ME. westwardes (= D. westwärts = G. westwärts); as westward + adv. gen. -s.] Same as westward.

westy†, a. [ME. also westig; < AS. wēstīg, desert, < wēste, a desert, waste; see waste]. Waste; desert. Layamon, l. 1120.

westy² (wes'ti), a. Dizzy; giddy. Ray; Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

While he lies wallowing with a westy head,
And palish carcass, on his broiled bed.

Ep. Hall, Satires, IV. i. 158.

wet¹ (wet), a. [E. dial. and Sc. also wet and wat; < ME. wet, wet, wat, < AS. wāt = OFries. wēt, wēt = Icel. wāt = Sw. wāt = Dan. vand, wet, moist; akin to AS. water, etc., water, and to Goth. wato, etc., water; see water]. 1. Covered with or permeated by a moist or fluid substance; charged with moisture: as, a wet sponge; wet land; wet cheeks; a wet painting (one on which the paint is still semi-fluid).

Ziff the Erthe were made moist and wet with that Watre, it wold nevere here frust.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 100.

I, forced to go to the office on foot, was almost wet to the skin, and spoiled my silk breeches almost.

Pepys, Diary, II. 293.

In the greenest growth of the Maytime,
I rode where the woods were wet.

Swinburne, An Interlude.

2. Filled with or containing a supply of water: as, a wet dock; a wet meter. See phrases below.—3. Consisting of water or other liquid; of a watery nature.

Be your tears wet? Yes, faith. I pray, weep not.

Shak., Lear, iv. 7. 71.

4. Characterized by rain; rainy; drizzly; showery: as, wet weather; a wet season (used especially with reference to tropical or semitropical countries, in which the year is divided into wet and dry seasons).

Wet October's torrent flood. Milton, Comus, l. 930.

As to the Seasons of the Year, I cannot distinguish them there (in the torrid zone) no other way than by Wet and Dry.

Dampier, Voyages, II. iii. 2.

5. Drenched or drunk with liquor; tipsy. [Colloq.]

When my lost lover the tall ship ascends,
With music gay, and wet with joyful friends.

Prior, Ode to Damon.

6. In U. S. polit. slang, opposed to prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors: as, a wet town. Compare dry, 13.—A wet blanket. See blanket. A wet boat, a boat that is crank and ships water readily.

"Why don't you go forward, sir? . . . she is sure to wet us about." . . . "Thank you, but . . . (with an heroic attempt at sea-slang) I like a wet boat."

C. Roade, Love me Little, xvii.

A wet day. Some say a rainy day (which see, under rainy). Large, saith the noster, "part with nothing, but keep all against a wet day."

Collier, General Worthies, xi. (Davies.)

Wet bargain. Same as Dutch bargain (which see, under bargain). Wet bob, a boy who goes in for boating in preference to cricket, foot ball, or other land-sports. [Eton College slang.]

Everything is enjoyable at Eton in the summer half. The wet bobs on the river in all their many trials of strength, . . . and the "dry-bobs" in the playing-fields, with all the excitement of their countless matches.

C. E. Pascoe, Every-day Life in Our Public Schools, p. 62.

Wet brain, a dropsical condition of the brain and its membranes, sometimes observed in post mortem examinations of those who have died of delirium tremens. Wet-bulb thermometer. See psychrometer (with ent). Wet cooper. See cooper. Wet dock, a dock or basin at a seaport furnished with gates for shutting in the tidal water, so as to float vessels berthed in it at a proper level for loading and unloading. Wet goods, liquors:

so called in humorous allusion to dry goods. [Slang, U. S.]

Wet meter, a gas-meter in which the gas to be measured passes through a body of water. The wet meter regulates the flow of gas more steadily than the dry meter, but is more difficult to keep in order.—Wet plate, in photog., a plate coated with collodion and sensitized with a salt (usually the nitrate) of silver: so called because it is necessary, in this process, to perform all the operations of making the picture, to and including the final fixing of the plate, before the coating of collodion dries. For some thirty years, from about 1850, this was by far the most important photographic process in use, but it is now almost wholly superseded by the various rapid dry-plate processes. The phrase is also used attributively to note the process or anything connected with it. See collodion process, under collodion.—Wet port, a seaport as a place of entry for foreign goods, in distinction from a dry port, or land-port, a place of entry for goods transported by land. Encyc. Brit., VI. 729.—Wet preparation, a specimen of natural history immersed in alcohol or other preservative fluid.—Wet provisions, a class of provisions furnished to a ship, including salt beef and pork, vinegar, molasses, pickles, etc.—Wet pudding. See pudding, 2.—Wet Quaker, a Quaker who does not strictly observe the rules of his society.

Socinians and Presbyterians,

Quakers, and Wet-Quakers, or Merry-ones.

T. Ward, England's Reformation, I. 213.

Wet Quakerism. See Quakerism.—Wet steam. See steam and open, 13.—Wet way, in chem., the method of qualitative and quantitative analysis and assay in which the substance to be examined is first dissolved in some liquid and then treated with liquid reagents: the opposite of fire-assay, or treatment in the dry way. In the ordinary analysis of minerals, the substance is first finely pulverized and then dissolved in an acid, after which further treatment follows. If insoluble in an acid, it is fused with potassium or sodium carbonate, after which treatment the fused mass is soluble, either wholly or in part, the silica (if the mineral is a silicate) separating out and being removed by filtering, after which the process is continued the same way as when the substance is soluble without the necessity of a preliminary attack by an alkali at a high temperature. Ordinary analyses of minerals are made in the wet way, assays of ores not infrequently in the dry way.—With a wet finger, with little effort or trouble; very easily or readily: probably from the practice of wetting the finger to facilitate matters, as in turning over a leaf of a book, or rubbing out writing on a slate.

Walk you here; I'll beckon; you shall see I'll fetch her with a wet finger.

Dekker and Webster, Westward Ho, ii. 2.

wet¹ (wet), n. [E. dial. and Sc. also wet and wat; < ME. wet, wete, wate, wate, < AS. wātta, m., wāte, f. (= Icel. Sw. wāt = Dan. vade), wet, moisture, < wāt, wet; see wet¹, a.] 1. That which makes wet, as water and other liquids; moisture; specifically, rain.

I see wel how ye swete;

Have heer a cloth and wype away the wete.

Chaucer, Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 176.

Upon whose [a river's] weeping margin she was set;
Like usury, applying wet to wet.

Shak., Lover's Complaint, l. 40.

Aft ha'e I run your errands, lady,

When blawin' bath wind and wet.

Lady Mairry (Child's Ballads, II. 83).

The gable-end of the cottage was stained with wet.

T. Hardy, Three Strangers.

2. The act of wetting; specifically, a wetting of the throat with drink; a drink or dram of liquor; indulgence in drinking. [Slang.]

No bargain could be completed without a wet, and no friendship or enmity forgotten without recourse to the bottle.

A. C. Grant, Bush-Life in Queensland, I. 30.

3. In U. S. polit. slang, an opponent of prohibition; one who favors the traffic in liquor.—Heavy wet. See heavy.

wet¹ (wet), v. t.; pret. and pp. wetted or wet, ppr. wetting. [< ME. weten, wāten (pret. wette, watte, pp. wēt), < AS. wātan, wētan, ge-wētan (= Icel. Sw. wata = Dan. vade), wet, moisten, < wāt, wet; see wet¹, a.] 1. To make wet; moisten, drench, or soak with water or other fluid; dip or soak in a liquid.

Ne wette hir fingers in hir sauce depe.

Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 129.

2. To moisten with drink; hence, figuratively, to inaugurate or celebrate by a drink or a treat of liquor: as, to wet a new hat. [Slang.]

Down came all the company together, and away! the ale-house was immediately filled with clamour, and scoring one mug to the Marquis of such a place, oil and vinegar to such an Earl, three quarts to my new Lord for wetting his title.

Steele, Spectator, No. 88.

Then we should have commissions to wet.

C. Shadwell, Humours of the Navy, ii. 3.

To wet down paper, in printing, to dip paper in water, or sprinkle it in small portions, which are laid together and left under pressure for a time to allow the moisture to spread equally through the mass. The dampness of the paper fits it for taking the ink readily and evenly in the process of printing, and prevents it from sticking to the type. The finest printing, however, is done with dry paper, and ink of a suitable quality for such use.—To wet one's line. See line, 2.

I have not yet wetted my line since we met together.

L. Walpole, Complete Angler, p. 41.

To wet one's whistle. See whistle.—Wetting-out steep. Same as rat's steep (which see, under steep).—Wetting the block, among English shoemakers, the act of celebrating by a convivial supper, on the first Monday in March, the cessation of work by candle-light. Halliwell.

wet², v. and n. A Middle English form of *wit*¹.

wetand. A Middle English present participle of *wit*¹.

wetandly, adv. A Middle English form of wittingly.

wet-bird (wet'bêrd), n. The chaffinch, Fringilla caelebs, whose cry is thought to foretell rain. See cut under chaffinch. [Local, Eng.]

wet-broke (wet'brök), n. In paper-manuf., the moist and imperfectly felted stock or pulp as it leaves the wire cylinder, and before it has been smoothed out on the forwarding-blanket.

E. H. Knight.

wet-cup (wet'kup), n. A eupping-glass when used in the operation of wet-eupping. Sometimes it is specially constructed with a lance or scarificator, which can be used to incise the skin after the cup has been applied.

wet-cupping (wet'kup'ing), n. The application of a eupping-glass simultaneously with incision of the skin, by means of which a small quantity of blood is withdrawn. See cupping, 1.

wetel. A Middle English form of *wet*¹.

wether (weth'êr), n. [*E. dial. also wedder; < ME. wether, wethir, wedyr, < AS. wīther, a wether, a castrated ram, = OS. wīthar, wīther = D. wedder, weder = OHG. wīdar, MHG. wider, G. wīdder = Icel. wethr = Sw. vādur = Dan. væder, vædder, a ram, = Goth. wīthrus, a lamb; akin to L. vitulus, a calf, Skt. vatsa, calf, young, lit. 'a yearling,' connected with Skt. vatsara and Gr. ἔτος, a year, L. vetus, aged, old; see veal and retrun]. A castrated ram.*

And softer than the wolle is of a wether.

Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 63.

wether-hog (weth'êr-hog), n. A young wether. [Prov. Eng.]

wethewyndet, n. A Middle English form of withwind.

wetly (wet'li), adv. [< wet¹ + -ly²]. In a wet state or condition; moistly.

"Love," she says, very sweetly, while, for the last time, her blue eyes wetly dwell on his.

Rhoda Broughton, Joan, ii. 11.

wetness (wet'nes), n. The state or condition of being wet; also, the capacity for communicating moisture or making wet: as, the wetness of the atmosphere or of steam.

The wetness of the working fluid [steam] to which the action of the walls of the cylinder gives rise is essentially superficial.

Encyc. Brit., XXII. 488.

wet-nurse (wet'nêrs), n. A woman employed to suckle the infant of another. Compare dry-nurse.

wet-nurse (wet'nêrs), v. t. [< wet-nurse, n.] 1. To act as a wet-nurse to; suckle.

Or is he a mythus—ancient word for "humbug"—
Such as Livy told about the wolf that wet-nursed Romulus and Remus? O. W. Holmes, Professor, l.

Hence—2. To coddle as a wet-nurse does; treat with the tenderness shown to an infant.

The system of wetnursing adopted by the Post Office authorities in the case of the telegraph service has not been one of uniform success. Elect. Rev. (Eng.), XXVII. 205.

wet-pack (wet'pak), n. A means of reducing the temperature in fever by wrapping the body in cloths wet with cold water, and covering these with a blanket or other dry material.

wet-press (wet'pres), n. In paper-making, the second press in which wet hand-made paper is compacted and partially dried. E. H. Knight.

wet-salter† (wet'sal'têr), n. A salter who prepares or deals in wet provisions. See wet provisions, under *wet*¹. Compare dry-salter.

The Parade . . . smelt as strong about Breakfast Times as a Wet Salter's Shop at Midsummer.

Tom Brown, Works (ed. 1708), III. 86.

wet-shod (wet'shod), a. [< ME. wet-shod, wat-shod, wete-shodde; < wet¹ + shod¹]. Wet as regards the shoes; wearing wet shoes.

There [in the battle] men were wetshoede
Alle of Brayn & of blode.

Arthur (ed. Furnivall), l. 469.

Unless to shame his Court Flatterers who would not else be convinc'd, Cannte needed not to have gone wet-shod home.

Milton, Hist. Eng., vi.

So he went over at last, not much above wet-shod.

Buayan, Filgrin's Progress, ii.

wetter (wet'êr), n. One who wets, or practises wetting, for some purpose; specifically, in printing, a workman who wets down paper. See phrase under *wet*¹, v. t.

wetter-off (wet'êr-ôf'), n. In glass-making, a workman who detaches formed bottles from the blowing-iron by applying a moistened tool to the neck.

wetting-machine (wet'ing-ma-shēn'), n. A mechanism that dampens paper and makes it suitable for printing. It is made in many forms, the simplest of which is a flexible and vibrating rose-nozzle attached by a pipe to a water-tank. Paper for web-presses is usually dampened by a spray of water from a perforated pipe as the paper is automatically unwound.

wettish (wet'ish), a. [< wet¹ + -ish¹.] Somewhat wet; moist; humid.

we-uns. See under we.

weve¹, r. An old spelling of weave¹.

weve², r. t. A Middle English form of waive.

weve³, r. See weave².

wevilt, n. An obsolete spelling of weevil.

wext, r. An obsolete form of weal.

wey¹ (wā), n. [*< ME. weie, waie, weie, wege, < AS. wēga (= OHG. wēga = leel. wīg), a weight, < wegan, raise, lift; see weigh¹, n., and cf. weight¹.*]

1. A unit of weight, 14 stone according to the old statute de ponderibus. But a wey of wool is 63 tods, or 13 stone; locally, 30, 30½, or 31 pounds. A wey of hemp was 30 pounds in Somersetshire, 32 pounds in Dorsetshire, being 8 heads of 4 pounds, twisted and tied. A statute of 1430 declares that cheese shall not be weighed by the ounce, but by the wey of 32 cloves, each clove of 7 pounds, except in Essex, where it is 2-6 pounds, or 32 cloves of 7½ pounds. But locally it was 3 hundredweight, or 416 pounds.

Hence—2. A unit of measure, properly 40 bushels. So a statute of George III. makes a wey of salt one ton, which is 40 bushels. But another statute of the same monarch makes a wey of meal 48 bushels of 84 pounds each; and in Devonshire a wey of lime, coals, or culm was sometimes 48 double Winchester bushels. So in South Wales a wey of coals is 6, not 5, chaldrons.

3. An amount of window-glass—60 cases.

[Eng. in all uses.]

wey², wey³, r. Obsolete spellings of weigh¹.

weyeret, n. An obsolete form of wey¹.

weyret, n. An obsolete spelling of weicher.

Weymouth pine. See pinet.

weyver, r. An old spelling of waive.

wezand¹, n. An obsolete spelling of weasand.

w. f. In printing, an abbreviation of wrong font: a mark on the margin of a proof, calling attention to the fact that the letter or letters, etc., opposite differ from the rest in size or face.

W. G. An abbreviation of Worthy Grand, prefixed to various titles of office among Free-masons and similar orders: as, W. G. C. (Worthy Grand Chaplain or Conductor).

wh. See W, 1.

wha (hwā), pron. An obsolete or dialectal (Scotch) form of who.

whaap, n. See whaup.

whack (hwak), v. [A var. of thack², appar. suggested by whap, whop, whip, etc., the form thack being intermediate between thack² and whack.] I. trans. 1. To give a heavy or resounding blow to; thwack. [Colloq.]

A traveller, coming up, finds the missing man by whacking each of them over the shoulder.

W. A. Clouston, Book of Noodles, ii.

2. To divide into shares; apportion; parcel out. [Slang.]

They then, as they term it, whack the whole lot.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, II. 152.

II. intrans. 1. To strike, or continue striking, anything with smart blows. [Colloq.]—

2. To make a division or settlement; square accounts; pay: often in the phrase to whack up. [Slang.]

The city has never whacked up with the gas company.

Elect. Rev. (Amer.), XII. 9.

At last Long J— and I got to quarrel about the whacking; there was cheating a goin' on.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, II. 172.

whack (hwak), n. [< whack, v.] 1. A heavy blow; a thwack.

Sometimes a kick will give me a lick with a stick just as I'm going over; sometimes a regular good hard whack.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, II. 564.

2. A stroke; a trial or attempt: as, to take a whack at a job. [Slang.]—3. A piece; a share; a portion. [Slang.]

This gay young huncher had taken his share (what he called "his whack") of pleasure.

Thackeray, Shabby Genteel Story, v.

My word! he did more than his whack;

He was never a cove as would shirk.

G. Walsh, A Little Tin Plate (A Century of Australian Song, p. 509).

4. Appetite. Hallivell, [Prov. Eng.]

whacker (hwak'er), n. [< whack + -er¹.] Something strikingly large of its kind; a big thing; a whopper. T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Oxford, II. vii. [Slang.]

whacking (hwak'ing), a. [Pr. of whack, v.; cf. whopping, etc.] Very large; lusty; whopping: as, a whacking fish or falsehood. Often used adverbially: as, a whacking big fish. [Colloq.]

whahoo (hwā-hō'), n. Same as wahoo, but applied specifically to the winged elm.

whaint, whaintise. Middle English forms of quaint, quintise.

whaisle, whaize (hwā'zē), r. i. [A dial. freq. of whoeeze.] To breathe hard, as in asthma; wheeze. [Scotch.]

But sax Scotch miles thou try 't their nettles,

An' gart them whaize.

Burns, Farmer's Salutation to his Auld Mare.

whake, whaker. Dialectal forms of quake, quaker.

whale¹ (hwāl), n. [< ME. hwal, what, great, qual, < AS. hwal (pl. hwalas) = MD. wal = leel. hwal = Sw. Dan. hval, a whale, including any large fish or cetacean; also in comp. D. walvisch = OHG. walfisc, MHG. wal-risch, G. walfisch = leel. hwalviskr = Sw. Dan. hvalfisk, a whale (see whale-fish); cf. OHG. walira, MHG. waler, a whale; cf. also MHG. G. wels, shad. Hence ult. in comp. E. walrus, narwhal, horsewhale; ulterior origin unknown. Skat connects whale¹, as lit. 'the roller,' with wheel¹; others connect it with l. balena, a whale. Both derivations are untenable.]

Any member of the mammalian order Cetacea or Cete (which see); an ordinary cetacean, as distinguished from a sirenian, or so-called herbivorous cetacean; a marine mammal of fish-like form and habit, with fore limbs in the form of fin-like flippers, without external trace of hind limbs, and with a naked body tapering to a tail with flukes which are like a fish's caudal fin, but are horizontal instead of vertical; especially, a cetacean of large to the largest size, the small ones being distinctively named dolphins, porpoises, etc.: in popular use applied to any large marine animal. (a) Whale is not less strictly applicable than universally applied to the toothless or whalebone whales, all of which are of great size, and some of which are by far the largest of animals. They consist of the right whales, humpbacked whales, composing the family Balaenidae alone, and represent five well-marked genera, namely: (1) Balaena proper, the right whales, without any dorsal fin and with smooth throat; (2) Neobalaena, based on N. marginata, a whalebone whale said to combine a smooth throat with presence of a dorsal fin; (3) Rachianectes, with one species, R. glaucus, the gray whale; (4) Megaptera, the humpbacked whales, with a dorsal fin, furrowed throat, and long flippers, of several nominal species of all seas; and (5) Balaenoptera, the true finners, or rorquals, with dorsal fin, furrowed throat, and short flippers: it comprises at least four, and probably more, species. Various other genera have been named (as Agaplophos for certain so-called scrag-whales), and the generic synonyms of these whales are probably more numerous than the actual species. (b)

Skeleton of Southern Right Whale.

Whale is extended, nearly always with a qualifying word, to most of the odontocete or toothed cetaceans, and especially to those of great size, as the sperm-whale, but also to some of the smallest, no larger than a dolphin, as the pygmy or porpoise sperm-whales of the genus Kogia, and to various forms of intermediate sizes, as the pilot-whales (Globicephalus), the bottle-nosed or bottle-headed whales (Hyperoodon), the white whales (Delphinapterus), etc. Some of these whales also have distinctive names into which whale does not enter, as blackfish, beluga, bottlenose, bottlenose, grampus, killer, etc., or they share the qualified names porpoise and dolphin with various small cetaceans more properly so called. The genera and species of the toothed whales are much more numerous than those of the baleen whales; their synonymy is very extensive and intricate, and is in some cases in a state of confusion which can only be cleared up by future research. (c) In geologic time whales date back to the Eocene; and a suborder Archaeoceti (contrasted with Odontoceti and Mysticeti) has been named to cover certain forms still only imperfectly known from fragmentary remains. (See Zeuglodon.) The oldest whales like any of the living forms date from the late Eocene, and are toothed whales related to the humpbacks. Whalebone whales are not known to be older than the Pliocene. (d) In present geographical distribution whales are found in all seas, and some of them enter rivers. Most of the species are individually wide-ranging on the high seas, and attempts which have been made to discriminate similar forms from different waters have in most cases proved futile. Several of the larger forms have been the objects of systematic fisheries for centuries. (See whale-fishery.) The principal products are oil, both train and sperm, baleen or whalebone, spermaceti, and ambergris; the hide of some of the smaller whales affords a leather. Whales are exclusively carnivorous, and feed for the most part upon a great variety of small animals which float on the surface of the sea, generally known collectively as brit or whale-brit. This includes various cephalopods, as squids and cuttles, with other mollusks of different orders, as well as several different kinds of crustaceans. Brit of some kinds covers the ocean in immense areas, to which the whales resort as feeding-grounds. Some whales attack large animals, even of their own kind (see killer, breel), but nearly all are timid and inoffensive, seeking only to avoid their enemies, though capable of formidable resistance to attack. Whales bring forth their young alive, like all mammals above the monotremes, and suckle them; the teats are a pair, beside the vulva. They breathe only air, for which purpose they must regularly seek the surface, though capable of remaining long under water without respiring. The spouting of the whale is the act of expiration, during which the air in the lungs, loaded with water vapor, is forcibly expelled like spray in a single stream, or in two streams, according as the blowholes are single or there are a pair of these spiracles. Some sea-whales may be mixed with the breath, if the whale spouts beneath the surface, but the visible stream is chiefly condensed vapor, like that of human breath on a cold day. Whales have a naked skin, saving a few bristles about the mouth, chiefly in the young; the hide is often incumbered with barnacles, or infested with other crustacean parasites. The body temperature is maintained in the coldest surroundings by the heavy layer of blubber which lies under the skin of the whole body, and in the sperm-whale forms a special deposit on the skull, giving its singular shape to the head. The general form of the body is like that of a fish, in adaptation to entirely aquatic habits and means of locomotion. It tapers behind the body-cavity in a solid muscular part, the snout, and ends in broad, short flukes lying horizontally and extending from side to side. This tail-fin is the principal organ of locomotion, like the vertical caudal fin of a fish. The fore limbs form flippers of varying length in different species. These fins are of medium length in the right whale, short in the sperm and narwhal, and extremely long in the humpback. In all cases the pectoral fin has a skeleton composed of the same joints or segments as the fore limb of ordinary mammals, and of all the usual bones except a clavicle; but the digital phalanges are more numerous. The dorsal fin, when present, is a mere excrescence, without any bony basis. There is never any outward sign of hind limbs, but the skeleton of some whales includes certain vestigial bones of a proximal segment of the pelvic limb, entirely separate from the spinal column, and apparently only serving in the male as a suspensorium for the penis. There is consequently no sacrum, nor any break in the series of vertebrae from the hindmost that bears ribs to the end of the spinal column. The cervical vertebrae offer exceptional conditions. (See cut under acylolosis.) The dentition of whales is sufficiently diverse to furnish characters of the main divisions of cetaceans. The entire toothlessness of the baleen whales is matched by few mammals (see Edentata); the presence of teeth in the lower jaw only, as in various odontocete whales, is peculiar; the dentition of the narwhal is wholly exceptional. Teeth, when present, are always homodont (like one another) and monophyodont (there being no milk-teeth). The soft palate and the larynx are specialized in adaptation to the act of spouting. The digestive organs are comparatively simple; the uterus is bicornuous, the placenta diffuse and non-deciduate; the testes are abdominal; and there is no os penis nor seminal vesicle. The circulatory system is notable for its plexuses, both arterial and venous. Notwithstanding the outward resemblance to a fish, whales belong to the higher (eucabillan) series of mammals, having a relatively large brain. One of the most remarkable of the many anomalies presented by this highly specialized order of mammals is the difference in size of its members, the range being far greater than that of any other ordinal group—from 4 to about 80 feet in linear dimension. The size of the larger whales has been grossly exaggerated in many of the accounts which find popular credence. Adult right whales of different species range from 20 to 50 feet in length, only the polar whale attaining the latter dimension; the common humpback is from 40 to 50 feet long; the sperm-whale reaches 60 feet; and the rorquals of several species range from 40 to 80 feet, the maximum length being reached only by the blue rorqual, which is the largest of known animals. Arctic whale, the polar whale, Balaena mysticetus; that right whale which is of circumpolar distribution, as distinguished from any such whale of temperate North Atlantic or North Pacific waters, or from which the latter are sought to be distinguished, as the Atlantic, Pacific, northeast, or Biscay whale. Atlantic whale, the right whale of temperate North Atlantic waters. It is not distinct from the southern right whale, Balaena australis, though so named, as B. cisarctica, and as B. bisequens, the Biscay whale. Australian whale, the New Zealand whale. Baleen whale, any whalebone whale, as a right whale. See cut under Balaenidae and chalebone. Biscay whale, Balaena bisequens, long the object of a special fishery by the Basques, conducted as early as the tenth century. Black whale. (a) Any baleen whale, as distinguished from a sperm-whale. (b) See blackfish, 2, black-whale, and Globicephalus. Blue whale, Sibbald's whale; the large rorqual. Bone-whale, any baleen whale. Bottle-headed whale, a ziphioid whale; a cetacean of the family Ziphiidae. Bottle-nosed whale. See bottlenose, 1 (b), and cut at Ziphiidae. Bow-head whale, the polar whale, or bow-head. Bull whale, any adult male whale; a bull. Calif-whale, any young whale. California whale, the gray whale. See Rachianectes.—Calling whale, a calling-whale; a pilot-whale. Cape whale, the southern right whale, Balaena australis. Cow whale, any adult female whale; a dam. Denticete whales, the toothed whales. Digger whale, the gray whale.—Down whale, a whale under water, as in sounding. Finback whale, a finner-whale; a rorqual; any whale of the family Balaenopteridae. See cut under rorqual. Fin-whale or finner-whale, a finback whale; any whalebone whale with a dorsal fin, as a humpback or rorqual; a furrowed whale. See Balaenoptera, Megaptera, and cut under rorqual. Furrowed whale, a whalebone whale with the skin of the throat plicated, or thrown into ridges and furrows, and a dorsal fin; distinguished from smooth whale. The humpbacks and the finners or rorquals are furrowed whales. See Balaenopteridae.—Giant sperm-whale, the sperm-whale proper. See cut under sperm-whale.—Gray whale, the California whale, Rachianectes glaucus, a large finner-whale or rorqual of the Pacific coast of North America. It has many local names, as devil-fish, grayback, hardhead, mussel digger, ripsack, etc. See Rachianectes.—Great polar whale, the polar or Greenland right whale.—Greenland whale, the right whale of the North Atlantic; the great polar whale, Balaena mysticetus. Humpbacked whale. See humpback and Humpbacked Whale (Megaptera bairdii).

Megaptera.—Japan or Japanese whale, Balaena japonica, a right whale of the North Pacific.—Killer-whale. See killer, 3, and Orcin.—Loose whale, a whale that has not been struck by the toggle-iron, or a whale that has been fastened to, but has made its escape.—Mysticete whales, the toothless or baleen whales; whalebone whales. See Mysticete, Megapterinae, Balaenidae.—New Zealand whale, Neobalaena marginata, a whalebone whale of Polynesian and Australian waters, not yet well known, having the smooth throat of the right whales, a dorsal fin, very long and slender white baleen, small flippers with only four digits, and various osteological peculiarities. It is of smallest size among the baleen whales, being only about 20 feet long.—Northwest whale, the right whale of the northwestern coast of North America, Balaena sibbaldi, as distinguished from the southern right whale. Also called Pacific right whale.—Pilot-whale. Same as caating-whale.—Polar whale, the right whale of the arctic Atlantic waters, or Greenland whale, Balaena mysticetus, more fully called great polar whale, and by many local names, as bow-head, steep-top, ice-breaker, ice-whale, etc. Pygmy sperm-whale, a toothed whale of the genus Kogia; a porpoise sperm-whale (which see, under sperm-whale).—Right whale, a whalebone whale of the restricted genus Balaena; so called, it is said, because this is the "right" kind of whale to take. Right whales inhabit all known seas, and those of the main divisions of the waters of the globe have been specified by name, as the arctic, polar, or Greenland right whale, the Atlantic, the Pacific, the southern, the north-west, etc. These have received several technical names, as E. mysticetus of the Arctic ocean, E. bisulcatus of the North Atlantic, E. australis of the South Atlantic, E. japonica of the North Pacific, E. antipodorum of the South Pacific, and others. It is not likely that more than two valid species are represented in this synonymy: (a) E. mysticetus of circumpolar distribution in the northern hemisphere. It attains a length of from 40 to 50 feet, has no dorsal fin, flippers of medium size, and very long narrow flukes, tapering to a point and somewhat balene. The greatest girth is about the middle, whence the body tapers rapidly to the comparatively slender root of the tail. The throat is smooth; the head is of great size; and the eye is situated very low down and far back, between the base of the flipper and the corner of the mouth. The profile of the mouth is strongly arched, and its capacity is enormous, exceeding that of the thorax and abdomen together. This cavern is fringed on each side with baleen hanging from the upper jaw; the plates are 250 to 400 on each side, the longest attaining a length of 10 or 12 feet; they are black in color, and finely frayed out along the inner edge into a fringe of long elastic filaments. When the jaws are closed, the baleen serves as a sieve to strain out the multitudes of small mollusks or crustaceans upon which the whale feeds, and which are gulped in with many barrels of water in the act of grazing the surface with open mouth. About 300 of the slabs on each side are merchantable, representing 15 hundredweight of bone from a whale of average size, which yields also 15 tons of oil; but some large individuals render nearly twice as much of both these products. (b) The southern right whale, E. australis, differs from the polar whale in its proportionately shorter and smaller head, greater convexity of the arch of the mouth, shorter baleen, and more numerous vertebrae. It inhabits both Atlantic and Pacific Oceans in temperate latitudes, and in the former waters was the object of a fishery during the middle ages for the European supply of oil and bone. This industry gave way to the pursuit of the polar whale about the beginning of the seventeenth century. This whale has long been rare in the North Atlantic, but has occasionally stranded on the European coast, and more frequently on that of the United States. A similar if not identical right whale is hunted in temperate North Pacific waters. Right whales are rare and not pursued in tropical seas, but are objects of the chase in various parts of the south temperate ocean. See cuts above, and under Balaenidae.—Rudolph's whale, the small finner-whale or rorqual, Balaenoptera borealis. See rorqual.—Sibbald's whale, a very large finner whale, the blue rorqual, Balaenoptera sibbaldi, one of the two or three largest of all animals. See rorqual.—Siebold's whale, a right whale of the North Pacific, nominally Balaena sieboldi. See northwest whale, above.—Smooth whale, a whalebone whale having no plications of the skin of the throat and no dorsal fin, as a right whale; distinguished from furrowed whale. See Balaenidae.—Southern right whale, Balaena australis of the South Atlantic, admitted as a distinct species from the polar right whale. See Atlantic whale, above.—South Pacific whale, a southern right whale, Balaena antipodorum.—Sowerby's whale, a ziphioid whale, Mesoplodon sowerbicus, of the Atlantic.—Spermaceti whale, the sperm whale.—Sulphur whale, sulphur-bottomed whale. Same as sulphur-bottom.—To bone a whale, to strike a bone, as the shoulder-blade, in lancing a whale.—Toothed whale, a whale or other cetacean with true teeth in one or both jaws; any member of the division Denticete or Odontoceti; distinguished from whalebone whale.—To throw a tub to a whale. See tub.—Very like a whale, an expression of ironical assent to an assertion or a proposition regarded as preposterous: from the use of the phrase by Polonius in humoring Hamlet's supposed madness:

Ham. Methinks it [a clond] is like a weasel.
Pol. It is backed like a weasel.
Ham. Or like a whale?
Pol. Very like a whale. Shak., Hamlet, iii. 2. 390.

Whalebone whale, a baleen whale; a toothless whale whose mouth contains whalebone; any member of the Balaenidae, as a right whale, humpback, or rorqual, whether furrowed or smooth.—Whale of passage, a migratory whale, or a whale during its migration.—Whale's bone, ivory; perhaps because supposed to come from the bones of the whale, at a time when the real source of the material was little known, or when most of the ivory used in western Europe consisted of the teeth of the walrus, confounded with the whale, and possibly those of the sperm-whale, which, though of comparatively small size, are of fine quality. The term was in common use for several centuries.

Her hands so white as whales bone,
Her finger tip with cassidone.
Pattenham, Partheniades, vii.

This is the flower that smiles on every one,
To show his teeth as white as whale's bone.
Shak., L. L. L., v. 2. 332.

White whale, a whale of the family Delphinidae and genus Delphinapterus, as D. leucas; a beluga. The species named inhabits arctic and subarctic waters, and is prized for its fine oil and valuable skin. The latter makes a kind of leather used for most bags and some military accoutrements. Also called whitefish. See cut under Delphinapterus.—Ziphioid whales. See Hyperoodon, Ziphius, Ziphiidae. (See also caating-whale, ice-whale, scrag-whale, sperm-whale.)

Whale¹ (hwāl, r. i.; pret. and pp. whaled, ppr. whaling. [*< whale*¹, n.]) To take whales; pursue the business of whale-fishing.

Cruising and whaling in the bays is full of excitement and anxiety. C. M. Seamman, Marine Mammals, p. 63.

Whale² (hwāl, r. t.; pret. and pp. whaled, ppr. whaling. [A var. of *whale*¹, the change of initial r to rh being perhaps due to association with whack, whap, whip, etc.]) To lash with vigorous stripes; thrash or beat soundly. [Colloq.]

I have whipped you, Antipodes [a horse], but have I whaled you?
T. Withrop, Camoe and Saddle, xii.

But first I would remark, that it is not a proper plan
For any scientific gent to whale his fellow-man.
Bret Harte, The Society upon the Stanislaus.

Whaleback (hwāl'bak), n. 1. Same as turtleback.—2. A vessel of which the upper deck is rounded; generally without upper works. Such vessels were first used on the great lakes.

Whale-barnacle (hwāl'bar'nakl), n. A cirriped of the family Coronulidae, parasitic upon whales, as Coronula diadema. See cut under Coronula.

Whale-bird (hwāl'bîrd), n. 1. One of the blue petrels of the genus Prion, several species of which inhabit the southern ocean. P. vittatus, one of the best-known, is notable for the expanse of its beak, the edges of which are beset with tooth-like processes. The name extends to several other oceanic birds which gather in multitudes when a whale has been captured, to feed upon the offal; they are chiefly of the petrel and gull families.

Whale bird (Prion vittatus).

2. The turnstone, Streptopelia interpres. Hearne, [Hudson's Bay.]—3. The red or gray phalarope. Kumlein, [Labrador.]

Whale-boat (hwāl'bōt), n. A long narrow boat, sharp at both ends, and fitted for steering with an oar as well as with a rudder, used in the pursuit of whales, and, from its handy and seaworthy qualities, also for many other purposes. It is usually from 20 to 30 feet long. A pair of these boats is commonly carried by ocean passenger-steamers, in addition to their heavier boats.

Whalebone (hwāl'bōn), n. and a. [< M.E. whale bone, gual-bon; *< whale*¹ + *bone*¹.] 1. n. 1. The elastic horny substance which grows in place of teeth in the upper jaw of whales of the family Balaenidae (hence called whalebone or bone whales), forming a series of thin parallel plates from a few inches to several feet long; baleen (which see). The term is misleading, for the substance is in no sense bone, but a kind of horn; and its trade-name whale-fin is equally inaccurate, for it has nothing to do with the fins of the whale. Whalebone grows in several hundred close-set parallel plates along each side of the upper jaw of the baleen whale, and thus in the situation occupied by the teeth of ordinary mammals; it is entirely shut in by the lips when the mouth is closed. Each one of the plates of both rows then bends with a strong sweep backward, and when the mouth is opened straightens out, so that there is always a heavy fringe on each side of the cavity of the mouth, forming an impassable barrier to the multitudinous small creatures which the whale scoops in from the surface of the sea. The longest baleen plates are those of the polar whale, some of which may exceed 12 feet in length. The plates in different species differ in color from a dull grayish-black through various streaked or veined colorations to somewhat creamy white. Whalebone stands quite alone among animal substances in a particular combination of lightness, toughness, flexibility, elasticity, and durability, together with such a cleavage (due to the straightness of its parallel fibers) that it may be split for its whole length to any desired thinness of strips. A sulphur-bottom whale has yielded 800 pounds of baleen, of which the longest plates were 4 feet in length. In the California gray whale the longest bone is from 14 to 16 inches, of a light or whitish color, coarse-grained, and heavily and unevenly fringed. The baleen of a finback is of a light lead-color streaked with black, attaining a length of 2 feet 4 inches and a width of from 12 to 14 inches, with a fine fringe from 2 to 4 inches long; it is somewhat ridged crosswise. That of the sharp-headed finner is entirely white, with a short thin fringe; it has been found to consist of 270 pairs of plates, the longest being 10 inches in length. Whalebone is or has been used in the manufacture of a great variety of articles.

2. Something made of whalebone or baleen; a piece of whalebone prepared for some regular use; as, the whalebones of a corset.—3. Specifically, a whalebone riding-whip.

They're neck and neck; they're head and head;
They're stroke for stroke in the running;
The whalebone whistles, the steel is red,
No shirking as yet or shunning.
A. L. Gordon, Visions in the Smoke.

4. In the middle ages, ivory from the narwhal, walrus, or other sea-creature, or supposed to be from such a source. See whale's bone, under *whale*¹, n.

To tell of his teth that tvelty were set,
Also qwyte & qwen as any quale bon.
Destruction of Tray (E. E. T. S.), i. 3055.

II. a. Made of or containing whalebone. Their ancient whalebone stays creaked.
H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 398.

Whalebone whale. See I, 1, and phrase under *whale*¹.

Whale-brit (hwāl'brit), n. Same as *brit*², 2. Compare *whale*¹, n., 1.

Whale-built (hwāl'bôlt), a. Constructed on the model of a whale-boat.

The Canadian fishing-boats are whale-built. Perley.

Whale-calf (hwāl'kalf), n. The young of the whale. Also calf-whale.

Whale-fin (hwāl'fin), n. In com., a plate or lamina of whalebone; whalebone collectively. (Both whale-fin and whalebone are misnomers, due to original ignorance of the source and nature of the material.)

A duty was imposed upon whale-fins, which, notwithstanding the double duty on fins imported by foreigners, went far toward the ruin of the Greenland trade.

S. Douell, Taxes in England, II. 61.

Whalefish (hwāl'fish), n. [= D. walrusch = OHG. walfisc, MHG. walfisch, G. walfisch = leel, hwalfisk = Sw. Dan. hwalfisk; as *whale*¹ + *fish*¹.] A whale.

There by be many whalefishes and flyinge fysshes.
R. Eden, in First Books on America (ed. Alber, p. xxviii).

Whale-fisher (hwāl'fish'ēr), n. A person engaged in the whale-fishery; a whaler. C. M. Seamman, Marine Mammals, p. 211.

Four plates of baleen, seen obliquely from within.

whale-fishery (hwāl'fīsh'ēr-i), n. 1. The occupation or industry of taking whales; also, the men, vessels, etc., engaged in this pursuit.—2. A locality that is or may be resorted to for the taking of whales; a place where whale-fishing is conducted, or where whales abound.

whale-fishing (hwāl'fīsh'ing), n. The act or occupation of taking whales; whaling.

whale-flea (hwāl'flē), n. Same as whale-louse.
whale-food (hwāl'fōd), n. Same as whale-bait. See *brit*², 2, *whale*¹, n., and cuts under Clyone and Limacina.

whale-head (hwāl'hēd), n. A remarkable gullatorial bird of Africa, related to the herons and storks; so called on account of the size of the head and monstrous shape of the beak; the whale-headed stork, or shoebill, Baleniceps rex, the only representative of the family Balenicipidae. See cut under Balenicipidae.

whale-headed (hwāl'hēd'ed), a. Having a large heavy head suggestive of a whale's; noting the shoebill. See whale-head. Encyc. Brit., III. 759.

whale-hunter (hwāl'hūn'ēr), n. A whaleman. Other . . . said that . . . he was come as far towards the north as commonly the whale-hunters use to traueil.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 4.
whale-lance (hwāl'lāns), n. The lance used in striking a whale. It may be either a hand-lance or a bomb-lance, but the term is more frequently applied to the former.

whale-line (hwāl'lin), n. Rope from 2 to 3 inches in circumference, made with great care from selected material, and used for harpoon-lines in the whale-fishery. It forms the tow-line of a whale-boat, with which a whale is made fast to the boat by means of the toggle-iron.

Whale-line is three-stranded rope, 2½ inches in circumference, composed of the finest hemp, 32 yards per strand. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 526.

whale-louse (hwāl'lous), n. Any small external parasite of a whale; a fish-louse or epizoeic crustacean infesting whales; especially, a lamodipod of the family Cymidae, as Cymus ceti and other species of this genus. See cut under Cymus. Also whale-flea.

whaleman (hwāl'mān), n.; pl. whalemen (-men). One who whales; a whaler; especially, one engaged in the actual capture of whales, as distinguished from another indirectly concerned in the industry.

Hundreds of islands in the Pacific Ocean were discovered and chartered by whalemen. The Century, XL. 523.

whale-oil (hwāl'oil), n. The oil obtained from the blubber of a whale or other cetacean. (a) Common oil, or train-oil, is that procured from the blubber of any baleen whale; it has a rank odor, and varies in color from honey-yellow to dark brown, according to the character of the blubber and the method of trying-out. It includes several chemically different substances, the more solidifiable of which may be extracted under pressure and cold, and constitute whale-tallow, the fluid residuum being called pressed oil. (b) Sperm-oil or spermaceti-oil is obtained from the sperm-whale and other toothed cetaceans. That from the head of the whale contains the spermaceti, which is deposited at ordinary temperatures on extraction from the animal, leaving the liquid oil, of a clear yellow color. (See spermaceti.) Sperm-oil when refined is much used as a lubricant for delicate machinery, and that from various cetaceans is often named from them, as grampus-oil, porpoise-oil, etc.—Black whale-oil. (a) Oil from the baleen whales, including the orquals; train-oil. (b) Oil discolored in running machinery.—Pressed whale-oil. See def. (a).

whaler¹ (hwāl'ēr), n. [*< whale*¹ + -er.] A person or a vessel engaged in the business of capturing whales.

For a whaler's wife to have been "round the Cape" half a dozen times, or even more, was nothing extraordinary. The Century, XL. 511.

But o' Thursday t' Resolution, first whaler back this season, came in port. Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, v.

whaler² (hwāl'ēr), n. [*< whal*² + -er.] Something whaling, or big or extraordinary of its kind; a whopper; a whacker. [Slang.]

whale-rind (hwāl'rind), n. The skin of a whale. It is thick, tough, and for the most part dark-colored, and overlies the blubber somewhat as the rind of a fruit covers the pulp.

whalery (hwāl'ēr-i), n.; pl. whaleries (-iz). [*< whale*¹ + -ry.] 1. The industry of taking whales; whaling.

The whalery not being sufficiently encouraging. Annals of Phila. and Penn., I. 7.

2. An establishment for carrying on whale-fishery or any of its branches. [Rare.]

They set up a glass-house, a tanyard, a saw-mill, and a whalery. Annals of Phila. and Penn., I. 12. whale's-foot (hwāl'z'fōd), n. Whale-bait. See *brit*², 2, *whale*¹, n., 1, and Clyone.

whale-shark (hwāl'shārk), n. 1. A shark of the family Rhiodontidae, Rhiodon typicus, one of the very largest sharks, and native of warm seas. See the technical names.—2. The basking-shark (which see, with cut).

whale-ship (hwāl'ship), n. A ship built for or employed in the business of whale-fishing; a whaling-ship or whaler.

Smeerenberg . . . was the grand rendezvous of the Dutch whale ships.
C. M. Scammon, Marine Mammals, p. 190.

whale-shot (hwāl'shot), n. [< MD. walschot, spermaceti, < wal, whale, + schot, what is cast; see *whale*¹ and shot.] Spermaceti or matter from the head of the whale; formerly so called by the Dutch and English whalers.

whale's-tongue (hwāl'tung), n. A misnomer of the acorn-worms, or species of Balanoglossus, mistranslating the technical generic name.

whaling¹ (hwā'ling), n. [Verbal n. of *whale*¹, v.] The act or business of taking whales; the pursuit of whales; whale-fishing; much used in compounds; as, a whaling-ship; a whaling-voyage; whaling-grounds; bay-whaling; shore-whaling.—Whaling company, a company engaged in whaling, consisting of a captain, a mate, two boat-steerers, and eleven men. The stock consists of boats, whaling-craft, and whaling-gear, and is divided into sixteen equal shares, and the "day" of each member of the company is the same. The captain and mate are paid a bonus of $300 or $350 for the term engagement, which is one year, and they are also exempt from all expenses of the company. C. M. Scammon.

whaling² (hwā'ling), p. a. [Prp. of *whale*², v.] Big, unusual, or extraordinary of its kind; strapping; whopping; whacking; as, a whaling lie. [Slang.]

whaling-gang (hwā'ling-gang), n. The crew of a whale-boat.

whaling-gun (hwā'ling-gun), n. Any mechanical contrivance for killing whales by means of an explosive and a projectile, as the bomb-gun, swivel-gun, darting-gun, and whale-rocket.

whalingman (hwā'ling-mān), n. A whaleman.
whaling-master (hwā'ling-mās'tēr), n. A captain of a whaling-craft, or one who is in command of a whaling-station.

whaling-port (hwā'ling-pōrt), n. A port of entry where whaling-vessels are owned and registered.

whaling-rocket (hwā'ling-rok'et), n. A special form of rocket used in whaling to carry a harpoon and line, and an explosive shell, into the body of a whale.

whaling-station (hwā'ling-stā'shən), n. In shore-whaling, a place where the try-works are located. C. M. Scammon. [Western coast of U. S.]

whall (hwāl), n. See *wall*³.

whallabee (hwāl'a-bē), n. Same as wallaby.

whally¹ (hwāl'i), a. [For wally*; *< wall*³ + -y.] Having a greenish tinge, as the eye in glaucoma. Compare wall-eye.

A bearded Gote, whose rugged heare And whally eyes (the signe of gelousy) Was like the person selfe whom he did beare. Spenser, F. Q., I. iv. 24.

whaly² (hwāl'i), a. [*< whale*¹ + -y.] Pertaining to or consisting of whales; cetaceous. [Rare.]

The ocean's monarch, whom Ioue did anoint, The great controller of the whaly rankes. Tourneur, Transf. Metamorphosis, st. 39.

whame (hwām), n. [Gf. whamp.] A fly of the genus Tabanus; a breeze or burrel-fly. See *breeze*¹. Derham.

whammel (hwām'el), v. t. Same as whemmle.
whamp (hwōmp), n. [Cf. whame and whop, dial. var. of wasp.] A wasp. [Prov. Eng.]

whampee, n. Same as wampus.

whang¹ (hwang), n. [A var. of thwang, now thong; see thong.] 1. A thong, especially a leathern thong.

He's taen four-and-twenty brad arrows, And laced them in a whang o'. Sweet Willie and Lady Margerie (Child's Ballads, II. 54).

2. A tough leather, such as is used for thongs, belt-lacing, etc. It is usually made of calf's hide, but sometimes of catskin or the hide of a dog, woodchuck, racoon, etc.

whang² (hwang), v. [Cf. Se. whank, beat, flog, also cut off large portions; prob. a var. of whack, confused with *whang*¹.] I. trans. 1. To beat or bang; thwack; whack; flog; also, to throw with violence. [Provincial or colloq.]—2. To cut in large slices or strips; slice. [Scotch.]

My uncle set it [a cheese] to his breast, And whang'd it down. W. Beattie, Tales, p. 8. (Jamieson.)

II. intrans. To make or give out a banging noise.

Bang, whang, whang, goes the drum.

Brocton, Up at a Villa.

whang² (hwang), v. [*< thaug*², v.] 1. A blow or thwack; a whack; a beating or banging; a bang. [Colloq.]

The whang of the bass drum
C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 317.

2. A cut; a piece; a slice; a chunk.

of other men's lether men take large whanges.
Ray, Proverbs (ed. 1678), p. 386.
Wi' sweet-milk cheese, in mony a whang.
Burns, Holy Fair

3†. Formerly, in Maine and some other parts of New England, a house-cleaning party; a gathering of neighbors to aid one of their number in cleaning house.

whangam (hwang'gam), n. A feigned name of some animal (probably meant for whang'cm).

A whangam that eats grasshoppers had marked . . . [this one] for its prey, and was just stretching forth to devour it. Giddsmith, Citizen of the World, xcvi.

Cf. whirl, from the same ult. root.] 1. A platform of timber, stone, or other material built on a support at the margin of a harbor or a navigable stream, in order that vessels may be moored alongside, as for loading or unloading, or while at rest. A wharf may be parallel with and contiguous to the margin, when it is more especially called a quay; or it may project away from it, with openings underneath for the flow of water, when it is distinctively called a pier. (See cuts under pierwork.) In England wharves are of two kinds: (a) legal wharves, certain wharves in all seaports appointed by commission from the Court of Exchequer, or legalized by act of Parliament; and (b) suftenance wharves, places where certain goods may be landed and shipped by special suftenance granted by the Crown for that purpose. In American seaports wharves generally belong to the municipality, and are often leased to their occupants, but some are private property.

Lith. hwetys, Lett. hweschi, wheat (prob. < Tent. lit. 'that which is white' with ref. to the color of the grain or the meal), < AS. hwet, etc., white; see white.] A cereal grain, the product of species of Triticum, chiefly of T. sativum (T. vulgare). The origin of the plant is not clearly known, but it is thought by many to be derived from a grass, Eriopogon, in the Mediterranean region, now classed as a species of Poa. The wheat-plant is a grass closely related to barley and rye, having a dense four-sided spike, and grains longitudinally furrowed on one side, furged on the other. In some varieties the paleas bear awns, in others not, the varieties being respectively called bearded and beardless or hull. Some are planted in the spring—spring or summer wheat—others in the fall, maturing the next season—winter wheat. The product of the latter was formerly preferred, but with recent methods of manufacture spring wheat is equally valued. The varieties are further classified as white and red or amber, referring to the color of the grain; among winter wheats, at least, the white are more esteemed. The grain is highly nutritious, containing some 67 per cent. of carbohydrates, 13 per cent. of albuminoids, together with small quantities of the mineral substances, potash, soda, etc., required by the animal system, with only 14 per cent. of water. For use it is chiefly converted into flour; the finest but not the most nutritious flour is nearest pure starch. The richer elements lie nearest the skin, and these are secured in "Graham" flour, which properly includes the whole grain, and by recent milling processes which appropriate all but the cuticle. Wheat was formerly made in England into a dish called frumenty or frumentum, by boiling it entire in milk, and seasoning. It is now largely used in America in the form of cracked, crushed, or rolled wheat, or wheat-grits. Wheat has been known from antiquity, being mentioned in Scripture; it is traceable to ancient Egypt, and is recorded as introduced into China about 2700 B. C. It now furnishes the principal breadstuff among all civilized nations. It is adaptable to various conditions and widely grown in temperate regions; it is not excluded by cold winters, but requires a mean summer temperature of not less than 57°. Among the principal countries which produce a surplus are the United States, Canada, Russia, Hungary, India, Australia, Egypt, Romania, and Turkey. The varieties are very numerous, and there are several more or less strongly marked races, one of which is spelt.

Amber wheat. See def.—Arras wheat. See Emmer wheat, below. China wheat, a spring wheat grown in the United States, said to have been derived from a grain found in a tea-chest. Clock wheat, a variety of the race known as Triticum turgidum.—Cow-wheat, a plant of the genus Arctostaphylos, particularly A. arvensis, with beautifully variegated flowers in a long spike. The American cow wheat is M. americanum, an inconspicuous plant.

Dinkel wheat, spelt. Emmer wheat, the race called Triticum dicoccum, including the Arras wheat of Abyssinia. Its varieties flourish in poor soil, are remarkably exempt from diseases, and make excellent starch. Guinea wheat. See Turkey wheat, below.

Indian wheat. (a) A former name in England for Indian corn, Zea Mays. See cut under Zea. (b) Paspalum Tataricum, which is cultivated to some extent in the United States, particularly in the northwest. Oil of wheat. See oil.—One-grained or single-grained wheat, a wheat with one seed to each spikelet—Triticum monoccum—which appears to be a true species. Also called St. Peter's corn.—Red wheat. See def.—Revet or rivet wheat, a variety of the race Triticum turgidum.—Saracen's wheat, buckwheat. Compare sarazin.—Single-grained wheat. See one-grained wheat, above.—Spring wheat, summer wheat. See def.—Tatary wheat, the India or Indian wheat, Paspalum Tataricum.—Tea wheat. Same as China wheat.—Turkey wheat, Turkish wheatt, Indian corn, vaguely supposed to come from Turkey (compare turkey). Also called Guinea wheat and Indian wheat.

There grows in several parts of Africa, Asia, and America a kind of corn called Mays, and such as we commonly name Turkey wheat. They make bread of it which is hard of digestion, heavy in the stomach, and does not agree with any but such as are of a robust and hail constitution.

L. Leclercq, Treatise on Foods (1704), p. 71. (Darvies.)

We saw a great many fields of Indian corn, which grows to the height of six or seven feet. It is made into flour for the use of the common people, and goes by the name of Turkey wheat.

Smollett, Travels, viii.

Wheat-aphid or -aphis, a wheat plant-louse (see below).—Wheat bulb-fly, Uthomyia arctica, a European fly of the family Anthomyiidae, whose larva infests the stems of wheat.—Wheat bulb-worm, the larva of an osineid fly, Meromyza americana, which affects the stems of wheat in the United States and Canada, stunting the ears, and prematurely ripening the kernels.—Wheat-cutworm, the larva of an American noctuid moth, Lophophora frugiperda. Also called grass-worm and fall army-worm. See Lophophora, C. F. Rilev.

—Wheat-dampening machine, a machine for washing grain to free it from smut and dirt, and afterward drying it. E. H. Knight.—Wheat eel-worm, a nematode worm of the family Anguillulidae, Tylenchus tritici, which causes the disease known as ear-eckle, purples, or false ergot in wheat in Europe. It produces round dark-colored distorted growths in the ear of wheat. Also called wheat-worm.

—Wheat gall-fly, Uthomyia arctica, a European fly of the family Anthomyiidae, whose larva infests the stems of wheat.—Wheat gall-worm, the adult of the wheat joint-worm. See Issosoma, 1. joint-worm, 2, and cut under wheat-fly.—Wheat-head army-worm, the larva of an American noctuid moth, Leucania abolinea. See Leucania.

—Wheat plant-louse, one of several aphids, or Aphididae, which infest wheat, as Siphonophora avenae and Toxoptera granitum.—Wheat straw-worm, the wheat joint-worm. See joint-worm, 2.

—Wheat whisky. See whisky.—Wheat-wireworm. See wireworm.—White wheat. See def.—Winter wheat. See def. (See also nammy-wheat, not wheat.)

wheat-bird (hwët'berd), n. The chaffinch or wheats-bird. [Local, British.]

wheat-brush (hwët'brush), n. In milling, a grain-scouring machine. It consists essentially of two brushes in the form of disks placed close together in a hopper, one brush remaining stationary, and the other revolving rapidly as the grain is delivered between them. The grain is carried to the periphery of the brushes by centrifugal force, and falls into a chamber beneath, whence the dust is removed by a suction-blast. E. H. Knight.

wheat-bug (hwët'bug), n. Either one of two bugs, Miris tritici and M. dolabratus, found commonly on wheat in England. Curtis, Farm Insects.

wheat-caterpillar (hwët'kat'ër-pil-är), n. A small caterpillar which eats the kernels of wheat in the field: supposed to be Asopia costalis. T. W. Harris.

wheat-chafer (hwët'chä'fër), n. A beetle, Anisoplia austriaca, which does great damage to European wheat-fields, particularly those of Russia.

wheat-cracker (hwët'krak'ër), n. A mill for cracking wheat to make grits.

wheat-drill (hwët'dril), n. See drill, n., 3.

wheat-duck (hwët'duk), n. The American widgeon, Marca americana, found in large flocks in wheat-fields. G. Trumbull, 1888. [Oregon.]

wheat-ear (hwët'ër), n. [< wheat + ear.] An ear of wheat.

Gold flashed out from the wheat-ear brown,

And flame from the poppy's leaf.

Eliza Cook.

Wheat-ear stitch, in embroidery, a fancy stitch; a variety of chain-stitch by which is produced a pattern somewhat resembling an ear of grain with stiff beard.

wheatear (hwët'ër), n. [A corruption, simulating wheat + ear.] (also used in the form white-ear, with the first element unaltered), of white-arse, or rather of its earlier form whitese* (taken as a plural, whence the supposed singular wheat-ear): so called from its white rump, < white + arse. The name is equiv. to whitetail, formerly whittail, and the F. name cul blanc.] A chat of the genus Saxicola, Saxicola ananthe, the stonechat, fallow-finch, or whitetail, an oscine passerine bird abundant in Europe, Asia, and Africa, and found sparingly in North America. The wheatear is 6½ inches long, and 12½ in extent; it varies much in plumage with sex, age, and season. The adult male in summer has the upper parts French gray, with conspicuous white rump and white base of the black tail; the under parts are some shade of buff, often whitish; brown. The female is brownish, darkest on the upper parts, with wings and tail like those of the male; the young resemble the female, but are spottier. The nest is made on the ground; the eggs are four to seven, greenish-blue, usually spotless, sometimes faintly speckled. The wheat-eater shares with both the British species of Pratincola the name stonechat, which is more appropriate to this bird than to either of the bushchats; it is more fully specified as white-rumped stonechat, and also called white-rump, whitetail, stone-chatter (from its Gaelic name clacharan, which survives in Scotland and in books), fallow-finch, and by other local names.

What cook of any spirit would lose her time in picking larks, wheat-eats, and other small birds?

Swift, Directions to Servants (1700).

Although the wheat-eater's colors are somewhat chaste, still their bold contrast, and the manner in which they are distributed, make the bird a very pretty one.

Seebold, Hist. Brit. Birds, 1. 302.

wheat-eel (hwēt'ēl), n. [Appar. < wheat + eel, but perhaps a dial. form of wheat-crēl*, < wheat + crēl.] Ear-cockle or purple, a disease of wheat caused by the eel-worm, Tylenchus tritici.

wheaten (hwēt'in), a. [< ME. wheaten, hueten, hweaten, < AS. hweāten (= MD. weiten, D. weihen) = G. weizen (brod)], < hwāte, wheat, + -en, E. -en.] Of, pertaining to, or made from wheat: as, wheaten straw. Specifically—(a) Made of the stalks, straw, or husks of wheat.

There wayted Summer naked starke, all sune a wheaten hat.

Golding, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., ii.

Peace should still her wheaten garland wear.

fly, a variety of Isosoma hordei, whose larva is the wheat joint-worm. See joint-worm, 2.

wheat-grader (hwēt'grā'dēr), n. In milling, a machine for cleaning, separating, and grading wheat according to the size and shape of the grains; a grain- or wheat-separator. E. H. Knight.

wheat-grass (hwēt'grās), n. The couch- or quitch-grass, Agropyrum repens; also, any wild grass of the genus Agropyrum or Triticum.

wheatland (hwēt'land), n. Land sown with wheat.

Beyond the wheatlands in the northern pines.

A. Lampman, The Academy, Nov. 23, 1889, p. 335.

wheat-maggot (hwēt'mag'ot), n. The larva of any one of the dipterous insects affecting the wheat-plant.

wheat-midge (hwēt'mij), n. 1. A dipterous insect of the family Cecidomyiidae, Diplosis tritici, which lays its eggs in the flowers of wheat-heads, and whose minute reddish larvæ devour the kernels. It is originally a European insect, but has been imported into the United States and Canada. The larva is known in England as the red maggot.

2. A dipterous insect, Lasioptera obfusca. Encyc. Diet.

wheat-mildew (hwēt'mil'dū), n. A name applied in England to the common rust (Puccinia graminis), found on various grasses, and especially on wheat and oats. In the United States it is applied to Erysiphe graminis, a true powdery mildew.

wheat-mite (hwēt'mit), n. Same as flour-mite.

wheat-moth (hwēt'mōth), n. One of several small moths whose larvæ devour stored wheat, as the Angoumois grain-moth (Gelechia cerealella), the Indian-meal moth (Ephestia interpunctella), the Mediterranean flour-moth (Ephestia kühniella), or the wolf-moth (Tinea granella).

wheat-pest (hwēt'pest), n. A dipterous insect, the frit-fly, Oscinis castator.

wheat-riddle (hwēt'rid'el), n. A grain- or wheat-separator.

wheat-rust (hwēt'rūst), n. Same as red rust and black rust (see both, under rust).

wheat-scourer (hwēt'skour'ēr), n. In milling, a cleaning-machine which receives the grain as passed from the smutter, and removes any hairs or loose parts of the outer bran. One form consists of a stiff brush with a grooved burrstone revolving against it below, the wheat passing between the two. E. H. Knight.

wheat-stalk-bird (hwēt'stāl-bērd), n. The chaffinch, Fringilla caerulea: so called from its congregating in autumn about the time of sowing wheat. J. H. Garney. See cut under chaffinch. [Norfolk, Eng.]

wheat-separator (hwēt'sep'g-rā-tor), n. An apparatus for freeing wheat from mustard-seed, cockle, grass-seed, etc. The grain is made to pass over a series of inclined plates pierced with holes which allow the passage of the smaller seeds but retain the wheat. E. H. Knight.

Wheatstone bridge. See resistance, 3.

wheat-thief (hwēt'thēf), n. The corn grom-welt or bastard alkaneet, Lithospermum arvense, a grain-field weed of Europe and parts of Asia, introduced in North America.

wheat-thrips (hwēt'thrips), n. Any one of several species of thrips found abundantly upon wheat, and commonly supposed to injure the wheatlands, as Thrips cerealeum of Europe, and Limothrips tritici and L. graminum of the United States.

wheat-weevil (hwēt'wē'vī), n. 1. The grain-weevil.—2. The rice-weevil. See also Calandra, 2, and weevil.

wheat-worm (hwēt'wērm), n. Same as wheat eel-worm (which see, under wheat).

wheazet, v. i. An old spelling of whizzer.

whedert, pron. An old spelling of whether 1.

wheddle (hwē'dl), v. pret. and pp. wheddled, pp. wheddling. [Formerly wheddle; perhaps for weeddle*, < G. weedeln, wag the tail, fan (hence fawn, flatter).] < weedel, a fan, tail, brush, MHG. weedel (weadel), OHG. weidil (weadil), fan, winnowing-fan, lit. instrument for blowing; with formative -del (-thelo), < OHG. wehan, MHG. G. wechen, blow; see wind 2. Similar uses occur with Dan. logre, wag the tail, also fawn upon one; with leel, flathra, wag the tail, fawn upon; with OF. coneler, wag the tail, etc. It is not clear how a G. word of this kind could get into E.; but the German wars of the 17th century brought in a number of words, and this may have been taken up as a slang term. Some refer wheddle to W. cheddai, talk, gossip, < chedd, a fable, story, discourse; but the resemblance is superficial.] 1. trans. 1. To entice, especially by soft words; gain over by coaxing and flattery; cajole; coax; flatter; hence, to coax; take in.

I admire thy Impudence. I could never Have had the Face to have wheddled the poor Knight so.

Etherege, She Would if She Could, i. 1.

And so go to her, begin thy n.w. employment; wheddle her, jest with her, and be better acquainted one with another.

Wycherley, Country Wife, ii. 1.

I am not the first that he has wheddled with his dissimulating Tongue.

Congreve, Way of the World, v. 1.

It is (probably) the best Conduct not to bear away Quarters, (till you have wheddled the Enemy into your Wake.

W. Mountaine, Seaman's Vade-Mecum (ed. 1761), p. 120.

2. To gain or procure by flattery or coaxing.

I have . . . a deed of settlement of the best part of her estate, which I wheddled out of her.

Congreve, Way of the World, iii.

II. intrans. To flatter; coax.

His business was to pump and wheddle.

S. Butler, Hudibras, II. iii. 335.

If that wheddling Villain has wrought upon Foible to detect me, I'm ruin'd. Congreve, Way of the World, iii. 4.

In a fawning, wheddling tone. C. Kingsley, Hypatia, iv.

wheddlet (hwē'dl), n. [< wheddle, v.] 1. One who wheddles; a cajoling or coaxing person.

Hip. Methinks you might believe me without an oath. You saw I could dissimulate with my father, why should you think I could not with you?

Ger. So young a wheddlet!

Wycherley, Gentleman Dancing-Master, iv. 1.

2. A piece of cajolery; a flattering or coaxing speech; a hoax.

Why, hast thou lost all Sense of Modesty?

Dost thou think to pass these gross wheddles on me too?

Etherege, She Would if She Could, i. 1.

wheddler (hwē'dl'ēr), n. [< wheddle + -er.] One who wheddles.

wheddlesome (hwē'dl-sūm), a. [< wheddle + -some.] Coaxing; cajoling. [Rare.]

Anything more irresistibly wheddlesome I never saw.

L. M. Alcott, Hospital Sketches, etc., p. 88.

wheddling (hwē'dl'ing), n. [Verbal n. of wheddle, v.] The act or art of coaxing, cajoling, or deluding by flattery.

He wrote several pieces, viz. "The English Rogue," "The Art of Wheddling," &c.

Andrey, Lives (Meriton).

wheel 1 (hwēl), n. [< ME. wheol, whele, whet, wheel, quēl, hweel, hūgel, hweol, < AS. hweol, hwiol, contr. of hweorol, hweohl (= MD. weel, weel, D. weel = Lat. weel, weel = leel, hyl = OSw. hring, Sw. hyl = Dan. hyl, a wheel); Teut. appar. hwehula*, hwehula*, perhaps = Gr. kúklos, a wheel, circle; see cycle 1. The leel, hweol, orb, disk, can hardly be related.] 1. A circular frame or solid disk turning on an axis. Wheels, as applied to vehicles, usually consist of a nave, into which are inserted spokes or radii, connecting it with the periphery or circular ring. (See car-wheel (with cut); also cuts under car-track and felly.) Wheels are most important agents in machinery, being employed in a variety of forms and combinations for a great variety of purposes, as for transmitting motion, regulating velocity, converting one species of motion into another, reducing friction, equalizing the effect of forces applied in an intermittent or irregular manner, etc.

The carters over-ryden with his carte,

Under the wheel ful lowe he lay adoun.

Chaucer, Knight's Tale (ed. Morris), i. 1165.

Smack went the whip, round went the wheels,

We're never folks so glad;

The stones did rattle underneath,

As if Cheapside were mad. Comper, John Gilpin.

2. Any instrument, apparatus, machine, or other object shaped like a wheel, or the essential feature of which is a wheel: as, a mill-wheel, a spinning-wheel, or a potters' wheel.

Then I went down to the potter's house, and, behold, he wrought a work on the wheels.

Jer. xvi. 3.

Thus, in lower life, whilst the wheel, the needle, &c., employ her, the plough of some trade perhaps demands the muscles and hardness of him.

W. Wallaston, Religion of Nature, viii. 1.

Turn, turn, my wheel! This earthen jar

A touch can make, a touch can mar.

Longfellow, Keramos.

The meal-sacks on the whiten'd floor.

The dark round of the dripping wheel.

Tennyson, Miller's Daughter.

(a) Naut., a circular frame with handles projecting from the periphery, and an axle on which are wound the ropes or chains which connect with the rudder for steering a ship; a steering-wheel. Where a ship is steered by steam, in place of an ordinary wheel a small wheel is used, by turning which steam is admitted to the engines which turn the barrel on which the wheel-rope is wound. (b) An instrument of torture. See to break on the wheel, under break.

The lifted axe, the agonizing wheel,

Luke's iron crown, and Damien's bed of steel.

Goldsmith, Traveler, I. 435.

(c) A framework of a circular shape which revolves on an axis, while burning by the reaction of the escaping gases. See catharine wheel, 3, and pinwheel, 3. (d) pl. Figuratively, a carriage; a chariot. [Poetical.]

How now, noble Pompey! What, at the wheels of Cæsar? art thou led in triumph?

Shak., M. for M., iii. 2. 47.

Earth in earth forgets these empty courts,

And thee returning on thy silver wheels.

Tennyson, Tithonus.

(e) One of the attributes of Fortune, the emblem of mutability.

Huanne the Iheuedi of Irap [lady of fortune] hath hire hwēd y-went [turned] to the manne.

Aeneid of Lucret (E. E. T. S.), p. 24.

Now y am vndre Fortunes whele,

My frendis forsaken me Enerycheon.

Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 73.

The next turn of the wheel gave the victory to Edward IV.

J. Gairdner, Richard III., i.

(f) A bicycle or a tricycle. [Colloq.]

A plucky long man with a fifty-six inch wheel, who crowned his effort with the difficult performance of bringing his machine to a stand-still before dismounting, and holding it so for several minutes. The Century, XIX, 494.

(g) In zool.: (1) The characteristic organ of a wheel-animalcule; the trochal disk of a rotifer; a wheel-organ (which see). See cuts under Rotifer, Rotifera, and trochal. (2) Some discoid or wheel-shaped calcareous or silicious concretion, as of an echinoderm or a sponge; a wheel-spicule.

3. A circular course or motion; a whirling round; a revolution; rotation; also, a wheeling, turning, or bending.

The leed, withouten fail,
Is, lo, the metal of Saturne,
That hath a ful large wheel to turne.
Chaucer, House of Fame, l. 1450.

Satan, bowing low, . . .
Throws his steep flight in many an airy wheel.
Milton, P. L., iii, 741.

4. A motive power; in the plural, machinery; hence, a principle of life or motion.

The wheels of weary life at last stood still.
Dryden and Lee, Edipus, iv, 1.

That power who bids the ocean ebb and flow, . . .
Builds life on death, on change duration founds,
And gives the eternal wheels to know their rounds.
Pope, Moral Essays, iii, 168.

When . . . the heart is sick,
And all the wheels of being slow.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, l.

5†. The burden of a song; a refrain; perhaps in allusion to its regular recurrence. Stevens.

Oph. [Sings.] You must sing a down a-down,
An you call him a-down-a.
O, how the wheel becomes it!
Shak., Hamlet, iv, 5, 172.

6. A factory for grinding cutlery. [Prov. Eng.]

This branch of trade [cutlery grinding] is, in Sheffield, conducted in distinct establishments called wheels.
Encyc. Brit., VI, 734.

7. A dollar. Tufts. [Thieves' jargon.]—8. In embroidery and fancy needlework, an opening, not necessarily circular, filled with radiating bars or brides of thread. It is a common form of decoration for collars and similar washable garments. Sometimes the radiating lines are interspersed with loops, festoons, and the like, or are of different lengths, so that a part of the opening will be filled with more bands than another part, producing diversity of pattern.

9. See warp 2, 11.—Adhesion of wheels to rails. See adhesion.—Aerohydrodynamic wheel. See aerohydrodynamic.—Bastard wheel. See bastard.—Big wheel. Same as large wheel. See spinning-wheel.—Blank wheel, a wheel having no teeth. —Cardiac wheel. See cardiac.—Center-discharge wheel, a turbine in which the water enters from the chute to the periphery of the buckets, passes inward, and is discharged at the center, about the axis. —Chilled wheel. See chill.—Eccentric wheel. See eccentric.—Elliptical wheel. Same as elliptical gearing (which see, under gearing).—Engaged wheels. See engaged.—Epicycloidal wheel. See epicycloidal (with cut).—Fifth wheel. (a) In mech. See fifth. (b) Figuratively, something superfluous or useless. —Foundling-wheel, a cylindrical box revolving on an upright axis, placed in an aperture in the door or wall of a foundling-asylum. It enables any person to confide an infant to the care of the asylum without being seen.

The ruota or foundling-wheel still exists in 1222 of the communes, being frequent in the Neapolitan provinces and Sicily.
Encyc. Brit., XIII, 443, note.

Impulse-wheel, a form of turbine water-wheel driven by the impulse of a jet.—Intermittent, internal, lapidary wheel. See the adjectives.—Large wheel. See spinning-wheel.—Long wheel, a workmen's name for a grindstone driven by a belt and a hand wheel 5 or 6 feet in diameter, which is turned by a laborer stationed behind the grinder.—Mansell wheel, a railroad-wheel in which the hub is composed of two wrought- or cast-iron rings bolted together. Car-Builders' Dict.—Middle-shot wheel, in hydraul., a breast-wheel which receives the water at about the middle of its height. See cut under breast-wheel.—Multiple wheel, a form of sash-wheel.—Multiplying wheel, a form of multiplying gearing; a geared wheel for converting slower movement into more rapid movement. Compare cut under tandem-wheel.—Mutilated wheel. See mutilated (with cut).—Non-circular wheel, a wheel having a perimeter which is not circular, but is elliptical, scotch-shaped, hyperbolic, etc. Two such wheels are employed for transmitting a velocity of variable ratio between a pair of parallel axes. E. H. Knight.—Persian wheel, a water-lifting wheel; a bucket-wheel or noria; an apparatus in which buckets, jars, or box-chambers are arranged in a radial position on a large wheel, which by its revolution dips the vessels in the water, fills them, and raises each in turn to empty its load on another level. It is used especially for irrigation. Compare cut under noria.—Pitch-back wheel, a form of water wheel in which the water, before descending into the buckets, is turned at an angle with its course in the flume; a kind of breast-wheel in which the water-supply is near the top of the wheel. Potters' wheel. See potter 1 (with cut).—Savart's wheel, an acoustic wheel instrument, consisting of a toothed wheel which can be rapidly rotated so as to strike against a card and produce a tone. The vibration-number of which can be accurately determined from the number of the revolutions of the wheel. Compare siren (with cut).—Saxon wheel. See spinning-wheel.—Skew wheel. See skew 1, 8.—Small wheel. See spinning-wheel.—Spiral wheels, in mach., a form of gearing in which the teeth are formed upon the circumference of cylinders of the required diameter at an angle with their respective axes. By this construction the teeth become in fact small parts of screws or spirals winding round the cylinders (whence the name). Wheels of this kind are often used when the two shafts require to pass each other. When the shafts are in the same plane bevel-wheels are employed.—Split wheel. See split gear, under split.—Sun-and-planet wheels. See sun 1.—To break a butterfly (fly, etc.) upon a (the) wheel, to subject one to a punishment out of all proportion to the gravity of the offense and the importance of the offender; hence, to employ great means or exertions for the attainment of trifling ends.

Satire or sense, alas! can Sporus feel,
Who breaks a butterfly upon a wheel?
Pope, Prolog. to Satires, l. 308.

He was sorry . . . for the excellent people, and deplored the necessity of breaking mere house-floes on the wheel.
Dickens, Little Dorrit, ii, 21.

To break upon the wheel. See break.—Toothed wheels. See toothed.—To put a spoke in one's wheel. See spoke 1.—To put one's shoulder to the wheel. See shoulder.—To slack over the wheel. See slack 1.—To steer a trick at the wheel. See steer 1.—Undershot wheel. See undershot.—Variable-speed wheels. See variable.—Waved wheel, in mech., a friction-wheel having a waved or convoluted surface, and imparting a reciprocating motion to an arc or lever pressing against its side. E. H. Knight.—Wheel and axle, one of the mechanical powers, consisting in its primary form of a cylindrical axle on which a wheel, concentric with the axle, is firmly fastened. A rope is usually attached to the wheel; the axle is turned by means of a lever; and the rope acts as in the pulley—that is, also upon the principle of the lever.—Wheel barometer, a modification of the siphon barometer. See barometer.—Wheel couching. See couching 1, 5.—Wheel crossbow, a crossbow in which the bow is bent by the revolutions of a wheel acting as a windlass. See cut under nonline.—Wheel-cutting machine. (a) A gear-cutting machine. (b) A device for dividing a circle into any number of equal parts. E. H. Knight.—Wheel-facing machine, a machine with adjustable cutters and rolls for facing the sides of wheels, making the felloes of uniform thickness, and forming a bevel. E. H. Knight.—Wheel-finishing machine, a form of slotting-machine for planing off the inner face of locomotive-wheel tires. The cutter is carried at the end of a vibrating lever.—Wheel of life. See zoetrope.—Wheel press, in the manufacture of locomotives and railway-cars, a powerful screw-press or hydraulic press by which wheels are forced on to turned bearings of axles with a frictional binding stress sufficient to hold them in place firmly without keys, set-screws, or other holding devices.—Wheels within wheels, a complication of circumstances, motives, influences, etc. Compare Ezek. i, 16.

It was notorious that, after this secretary retired, the king's affairs went backwards; wheels within wheels took place.
Roger North, Lord Guilford, II, 65.

Wheel tax. See tax.—Wire wheel, a brush-wheel made of wire instead of bristles, used for cleaning and scratching metals preparatory to gilding or silvering. E. H. Knight. (See also breast-wheel, bull-wheel, catharine-wheel, egg-wheel, crown-wheel, diad-wheel, flange-wheel, measuring-wheel, pinwheel.)

wheel¹ (hwēl), v. [*< ME. whelen, whiclen, hweolen; < wheel², n.] I, trans. 1. To cause to turn, or to move in a circle; make to rotate, revolve, or change direction.

So had he seen, in fair castle,
The youth in glittering squadrons start;
Suddenly the flying jennet wheel,
And hurl the unexpected dart.
Scott, L. of L. M., ii, 8.

The sun gradually wheeled his broad disk down the west.
Ireing, Sketch-Book, p. 438.

The Sun flies forward to his brother Sun;
The dark Earth follows wheeled in her ellipse;
And human things returning on themselves
Move onward, leading up the golden year.
Tennyson, Golden Year.

To wheel the wild scrub cattle at the yard
With a running fire of stockwhips and a fiery run of hoofs.
Contemporary Rev., LII, 405.

2. To convey on wheels or in a vehicle mounted on wheels.

You shall clap her into a post-chaise, . . . wheel her down to Scotland.

7. In tanning, to submit to the action of a pin-wheel. See pinwheel, 2.

The skins next go into the England wheel vat . . . and are wheeled.
C. T. Davis, Leather, p. 530.

8. To shape by means of the wheel, as in pottery. See potters' wheel (under potter 1), and throw 1, r. t., 2.—9. To break upon the wheel. See break.

II, intrans. 1. To turn on or as on an axis or about a center; rotate; revolve.

His Glory found
Thou first Mobile,
Which mak'st all wheel
In circle round.
Howell, Letters, I, v, 11.
The moon . . . not once wheeling upon her own center.
Bentley.

2. To change direction of course, as if moving on a pivot or center.

As he to flight his wheeling car address,
The speedy jav'lin drove from back to breast.
Pope, Iliad, v, 53.

Steady! steady! the masses of men
Wheel, and fall in, and wheel again,
Softly as circles drawn with pen.
Leigh Hunt, Captain Sword and Captain Pen, ii.

3. To move in a circular or spiral course.
Then wheeling down the steep of heaven he flies.
Pope.

The poor gold fish eternally wheeling round his crystal wall.
De Quincey, Secret Societies, ii.

The swallow wheeled above high up in air.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I, 15.

4. To take a circular course; return upon one's steps; hence, to wander; go out of the straight way.

Spies of the Volsees Held me in chase, that I was forced to wheel
Three or four miles about, else had I, sir,
Half an hour since brought my report.
Shak., Cor., i, 6, 19.

5. To travel smoothly; go at a round pace; trundle along; roll forward.

Thunder mix'd with hail,
Hail mix'd with fire, must rend the Egyptian sky
And wheel on the earth, devouring where it rolls.
Milton, P. L., xii, 183.

Through the rough copse wheel thou with hasty stride;
I choose to saunter o'er the grassy plain.
Wordsworth, River Duddon, xxx.

6. To move on wheels; specifically, to ride a bicycle or tricycle; travel by means of a bicycle or tricycle. [Colloq.]

The sun, gladdened by the sweet air, shone on the fields and woods, and the ugly barracks and pretty cottages by which we wheeled.
J. and E. R. Pennell, Canterbury Pilgrimage on a [Tricycle].

I assure you, there is no such whetstone to sharpen a good witte and encourage a will to learninge as is praise.

Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 26.

Let them read Shakespeare's sonnets, taking thence a whetstone for their dull intelligence.

Shelley, To his Genius.

To give, deserve, or win the whetstone, old phrases in which a whetstone appears as the proverbial prize for lying. Confirmed liars or slanderers were sometimes publicly exhibited with a whetstone fastened to them. Compare the following allusions.

If Mother Hubbard, in the vein of Chaucer, happened to tell one fanciful tale, father Elderton and his son Grem, in the vein of Skelton, or Scorgin, will counterfeit an hundred dogged fables, libels, calumnies, slanders, lies for the whetstone, what not.

H. Harvey, Four Letters.

The whetstone is a knave that all men know,
Yet many on him doe much cost bestowe;
Hee's used almost in every shopp, but whye?
An edge must needs be set on every lye.

quoted in Chaucer's Book of Days, II. 45.

This will explain a smart punce of Sir Francis Bacon's before King James, to whom Sir Kenelm Digby was relating that he had seen the true philosopher's stone in the possession of a hermit in Italy, and when the king was very curious to understand what sort of stone it was, and Sir Kenelm much puzzled in describing it, Sir Fra. Bacon interposed, and said, "Perhaps it was a whetstone."

and has acquired an extensive and intricate synonymy, chiefly of worthless New Latin names. The other whidah here figured is also South African, and has in the male a train of several long tailfeathers resembling in development and in general effect the upper tail-coverts of the paradise-trogon; it is also very large, the male being about 19 inches long.

This is Chera procer, the epaulet whidah, so called from the scarlet shoulders, in translation of a French name. Its original technical name was Eumecurus procer (of Boddaert, 1783, whence Chera procer of most modern writers), and it used to be called Eumecurus or Fringilla or Vidua longicauda, and Loxia or Fringilla or Chera cafra; but it is a monotype whose synonymy presents no serious difficulty. It inhabits from Cape Colony to Natal and the Transvaal, and also to Benguela. Other whidah-birds are noted under Vidua (which see).

cf. Vidua.] An oscine passerine bird of Africa, belonging to the family Ploceidae, or weaver-birds, and subfamily Viduinæ in a strict sense, and especially to the genus Vidua, or one of two or three closely related genera. They are small-bodied birds, about as large as a canary; but the males have several feathers of the tail enormously lengthened and variously shaped, forming a beautiful arched train. Any one of them is also called whidah-bird, whidahfinch, whidaw-bird, and simply whidah or widow, as well as by the French name reure. The original whidah-bird, or widow of paradise, is Vidua (or Stemonura) paradisæ, described and figured under Viduinæ (which see). The king whidahbird is Vidua regia (see Vidua, with cut).
The principal whidah-bird is Vidua principalis (see Vidua, with cut). The South African necklaced whidah-bird is Chlorospiza or Penthetra ardens, the male of which is 12 inches long, with a tail of 8½, and has the plumage nearly uniform black, normally varied with a Philadelphia Times, Aug. 1, 1883.

whiffing (hwif'ing), n. [Verbal n. of *whiff*³, v.] 1. Surface-fishing with a hand-line.

Whiffing, the process of slowly towing the bait (sculling or pulling in the known haunts of the fish).
Fidd, Dec. 26, 1885. (Encyc. Diet.)

It [the whiting] is often caught by whiffing, when it gives good sport.
Staud. Nat. Hist., III. 273.

2. A kind of hand-line used for taking mackerel, pollack, and the like.

whiffing-tackle (hwif'ing-tak'1), n. The tackle used in whiffing; surface-tackle.

whifle (hwif'1), v.; pret. and pp. whiffled, ppr. whiffing. [Freq. of *whiff*¹; perhaps confused with D. weifelen, waver.] I. intrans. 1. To blow in gusts; hence, to veer about, as the wind.

Two days before this storm began, the Wind whiffled about to the South, and back again to the East, and idled very faintly.
Dampier, Voyages, II. iii. 66.

Seizing a shovel, he went by the back door to the front of the house, at a spot where the whiffing winds had left the earth nearly bare [of snow], and commenced his sub-nivean work.
S. Judd, Margaret, i. 17.

2. To change from one opinion or course to another; use evasions; prevaricate; be fickle or unsteady; waver.

A person of a whiffing and unsteady turn of mind, who cannot keep close to a point of a controversy.
Watts, Improvement of the Mind, I. ix. § 27.

3. To trifle; talk idly. Phillips, 1706; Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]

I am not like those officious and importunate sots who, by force, outrage, and violence, constrain an easy, good-natured fellow to whiffle, quaff, carouse, and what is worse.
Cephalet, tr. of Rabelais, iii. Prod.

II. trans. 1. To disperse with a puff; blow away; scatter.

Such a would whiff away all these truths by resolving them into mere words and allegory.
De H. M. C., 1 pistle to the seven Churches, ix. [Latham.]

2. To cause to change, as from one opinion or course to another.

Every man ought to be steadfast and immovable in them [the main things of religion], and not suffer himself to be whiffled out of them by an unreasonable noise about the infallibility of a visible church. Edwards, Sermons, lxxv.

3. To shake or wave quickly. Donne.

whifflet (hwif'1), n. [whiffle, v., in sense of orig. verb.] A life.

Whifflet, . . . one that plays on a Whiffle or Life.
Baileys, 1727.

whiffler (hwif'1er), n. [whiffle + -er 1.] 1†. A piper or fifer.

His former transition was in the faire about the Juglers: now he is at the Pageants among the Whifflers.
Milton, On Def. of Humb. Remonst.

2†. A herald or usher; a person who leads the way, or prepares the way, for another: probably so called because the pipers (see *piper*¹, 1) usually led the procession.

The deep-mouth'd sea,
Which like a mighty whiffler fore the king
Seems to prepare his way.
Shak., Hen. V., v., cho., l. 12.

The term (whiffler) is undoubtedly borrowed from whiffle, another name for a tife or small flute: for whifflers were originally those who preceded armies or processions as fifers or pipers. F. Douce, Illus. of Shakespeare, p. 311.

I can go in no corner but I meet with some of my whiff-lers in their accompaniments.
Chapman, Monsieur D'Olive, iii. 1.

The Whiffers of your inferior and Chief companies clere the wayes before him.
Dekker, Seven Deadly Sins, p. 43.

Before the dame, and round about,
March'd whiffers and statlers on foot.
S. Butler, Hudibras, II. ii. 650.

3. One who whiffles: one who changes frequently his opinion or course; one who uses shifts and evasions in argument; a fickle or unsteady person.

Your right whiffler indeed hangs himself in Saint Martin's, and not in Cheapside.
Dekker and Webster, Northward Ho, ii. 1.

Every whiffler in a laced coat . . . shall talk of the constitution.
Swift.

4. A puffer of tobacco; a whiffer. Hallivell.—

5. The whistling, or goldeneye duck. G. Trumbull, 1888. [Maryland.]

whiffery (hwif'er-i), n. The characteristics or habits of a whiffler; trifling; levity.

Life is no frivolity, or hypothetical cœnocracy or whiffery.
Carlyle, in Froude, Life in London, iii.

whiffletree (hwif'1-trē), n. [whiffle, turn, + tree. Cf. whippletree, swingletree.] Same as swingletree.

Heywood, English Traveller (ed. Pearson), i. 2.

2. Buttermilk. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]

whig² (hwig), v.; pret. and pp. whiggled, ppr. whiggling. [Cf. Se. whiggle, var. of wiggle: see wiggle.] I. intrans. To move at an easy and steady pace; jog. [Scotch.]

The Solenn League and Covenant
Came whiggling up the hills, man, Battle of Killiecrankie (Child's Ballads, VII. 155).

To whig awa' wi', to drive briskly on with. Jamieson.

I remember hearing a Highland farmer in Eskdale, after giving minute directions to those who drove the hearse of his wife how they were to cross some boggy land, conclude, "Now, lads, whig awa' wi' her."
Scott. (Jamieson.)

II. trans. To urge forward, as a horse. [Scotch.]

whig³ (hwig), n. and a. [Formerly also whigg; prob. short for whiggamore, q. v.] I. n. 1. One of the adherents of the Presbyterian cause in Scotland about the middle of the seventeenth century: a name given in derision.

When in the teeth they dar'd our Whigs,
An' covenant true blues, man.
Burns, Battle of Sheriff-Muir.

I doubt I'll hae to tak the hills wi' the wild whigs, as they ca' them, and . . . be shot down like a mawkin at some dyke-side.
Scott, Old Mortality, vii.

2. [cap.] A member of one of the two great political parties of Great Britain, the other being the Tories (later the Conservatives). The Whigs were the successors of the Roundheads of the Civil War and the Country party of the Restoration. The name was given to them about 1679 as a reproach by their opponents, the Court party, through a desire to confound them with the rebel Whigs of Scotland (see *whig*¹, 1). The Whigs favored the Revolution of 1688-9, and governed Great Britain for a long period in the eighteenth century. In general, they may be called the party of progress; one of their principal achievements was the passage of the Reform Bill in 1832. About the same time the name Whig began to be replaced by Liberal, though still retained to denote the more conservative members of the Liberal party. See Liberal, Tory.

The south-west counties of Scotland have seldom corn enough to serve them round the year: And . . . those in the west come in the summer to buy at Leith the stores that come from the north: And from a word, Whiggam, used in driving their horses, all that drove were called the Whiggamors, and shorter the Whigs. Now in that year, after the news came down of Duke Hamilton's defeat, the Ministers animated their people to rise, and march to Edinburgh. And they came up marching on the head of their parishes, with an unheard-of fury, praying and preaching all the way as they came. The Marquis of Argyle and his party came and headed them, they being about 6,000. This was called the Whiggamor's inroad. And ever after that all that opposed the Court came in contempt to be called Whiggs. And from Scotland the word was brought into England, where it is now one of our unhappy terms of distinction.

Bp. Burnet, Hist. Own Times, I. 58.

I hate a Whig so much that I'll throw my Husband out of his Election, or throw myself out of the World! a Parcel of canting Rogues; they have always Moderation in their Mouths—rank Resistance in their Hearts—and hate Obedience even to their lawful Wives.
Mrs. Centlivre, Gotham Election, i. 1.

The prejudice of the Tory is for establishment; the prejudice of the Whig is for innovation. A Tory does not wish to give more real power to Government, but that Government should have more reverence. Then they differ as to the Church. The Tory is not for giving more legal power to the Clergy, but wishes they should have a considerable influence, founded on the opinion of mankind; the Whig is for limiting and watching them with a narrow jealousy.
Johnson, in Boswell, an. 1781.

3. [cap.] In Amer. hist.: (a) A member of the patriotic party during the revolutionary period.

The Hessians and other foreigners, looking upon that as the right of war, plunder wherever they go, from both Whigs and Tories, without distinction.
Robert Morris, Dec. 21, 1776, quoted in Lecky's Eng. in 18th Cent., xiv.

(b) One of a political party in the United States which grew up, in opposition to the Democratic party, out of the National Republican party. It was first called the Whig party in 1834. Its original principles were extension of nationalizing tendencies, and support of the United States Bank, of a protective tariff, and of a system of internal improvements at national expense. It won the presidential elections of 1840 and 1848, but soon after divided upon the slavery question. It lost its last national election in 1852, and soon after many of its members became temporarily members of the American and Constitutional Union parties, but eventually most of its northern members became Republicans, most of its southern members Democrats.—Conscience Whig, in U. S. hist., in the last days of the Whig party, one of those northern Whigs who were indisposed to regard the compromise of 1850 as a final settlement of the slavery question; so called from their conscientious objections to such compromises with slavery.—Cotton Whig, in U. S. hist., in the last days of the Whig party, one of those northern Whigs who were disposed to regard the compromise of 1850 as a final settlement of the slavery question; so called from their supposed partiality to the cotton interest.

II. a. Relating to or composed of Whigs, in any use of that word; whiggish: as, Whig measures; a Whig ministry.

The hope that America would supply the main materials for the suppression of the revolt [the American Revolution] proved wholly chimerical. One of the first acts of the Whig party in every colony was to disarm Tories.
Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xiv.

The Whig party was always opposed to slavery. But there was a broad and well-understood distinction between Whig opponents of slavery and the fanatical Abolitionists.
T. W. Barnes, Thurlow Weed, p. 306.

whig⁴ (hwig), n. A variant of *wig*². [North. Eng. and Scotch.]

A cook whose recipes were hopelessly old-fashioned, and who had an exasperating belief in the sufficiency of buttered whigs and home-made marmalade for all requirements.
Mrs. Humphry Ward, Robert Elsmere, ii.

whiggamore (hwig'a-mōr), n. [Also whiggamor, whiggamoor; according to Burnet, derived from whiggam, as used by the men orig. called whiggamores (def. 1) in driving their horses; whiggam is a dubious word, appar. connected with *whig*², jog: see *whig*². In the glossary to the Waverley novels whiggamore is defined "a great whig," appar. implying a derivation < *whig*³ + Gael. mōr, great; whereas the evidence indicates that *whig*³ is an abbr. of whiggamore. No Gael. form that could be the base of whiggamore appears; but it may be a perverted form from an original not now obvious.] 1. A person who came from the west and southwest of Scotland to Leith to buy corn. See the quotation from Bishop Burnet, under *Whig*³, 2.—2. One of the people of the west of Scotland who marched to Edinburgh in 1648, their expedition being called the whiggamores' inroad (see the quotation referred to in def. 1). Hence—3. A Scotch Presbyterian; one of the party opposed to the court; a whig.

There [at Rothwell Brigg] was he and that sour whiggamore they ca'd Burley.
Scott, Old Mortality, xxvii.

whiggarchy (hwig'är-ki), n. [*whig*³ + Gr. archē, rule.] Government by Whigs. [Rare.]

They will not recognise any other government in Great Britain but whiggarchy only.
Swift, App. to Conduct of the Allies.

whiggery (hwig'er-i), n. [*whig*³ + -ery.] The principles or practices of Whigs: first applied to the Scottish Presbyterian doctrine, and generally used as a term of contempt.

I'll hae nae whiggery in the barony of Tillietudlem — the next thing wad be to set up a conventicle in my very with-drawing room.

Scott, Old Mortality, vii.

Our friend was a hearty toper in the days of his Whiggery, but no sooner turned out of the tutest of Tories than he took to the teapot. It seems a thing against nature.

Notes Ambrosiane, Sept., 1832.

whiggification (hwig'f-i-kā-shən), n. [< whig³ + -ification.] A making or becoming whiggish. [Humorous.]

We were all along against the whiggification of the Tory System.

Notes Ambrosiane, Sept., 1832.

whiggish (hwig'ish), a. [< whig³ + -ish¹.] Of or pertaining to whigs, in any application of the name; partaking of the principles of whigs.

To the shame and grief of every whiggish, loyal, and true Protestant heart.

Swift, Polite Conversation, Int.

whiggishly (hwig'ish-li), adv. In a whiggish manner.

Being whiggishly inclined, [Thomas Cox] was deprived of that Office in Oct., 1683.

Wood, Faith Oxon., II. 54.

whiggishness (hwig'ish-nes), n. The character of being whiggish; whiggery.

Mr. Walpole has himself that trait of Whiggishness which peculiarly fits him to paint the portrait of the chief of the Whigs.

The Academy, Nov. 16, 1889, p. 311.

whiggism (hwig'izm), n. [< whig³ + -ism.] The principles of the whigs; whiggery.

whipping-top (hwip'ing-top), n. Same as whip-top.

whippetree (hwip'í-tré), n. Same as whiffletree.

whippoorwill (hwip'pör-wil'), n. [Formerly also whippoorwill (cf. poor-will); an imitative word, from the sound or cry made by the bird, as if "whip poor Will."] An American caprimulgid bird, Antrostomus vociferus, related to the chuck-will's-widow, A. carolinensis, and resembling the European goatsucker, Caprimulgus europaeus. It is 9 to 10 inches long, and 16 to 18 in extent of wings (being thus much smaller than the chuck-

Whippoorwill (Antrostomus vociferus).

will's-widow), and lacks the lateral filaments of the rictal bristles. The coloration is intimately variegated with gray, black, white, and tawny, giving a prevailing gray or neutral tone, somewhat frosted or hoary in high-plumaged males, ordinarily more brownish; there are sharp black streaks on the head and back; the wings and their coverts are barred with rufous spots; the lateral tail-feathers are black, with a large terminal area white in the male, tawny in the female; and there is a throat-bar white in the male, tawny in the female. The bill is extremely small, but the mouth is deeply cleft, and as wide from one corner to the other as the whole length of the rictus (as figured under psittorally). There has been some popular confusion between the whippoorwill and the night-hawk; they are not only distinct species, but belong to different genera, and their dissimilarity appears at a glance. Unlike the night-hawk, the whippoorwill is entirely nocturnal; it flies with noiseless wings, like the owl, and is oftener heard than seen. The notes which have given the name are trisyllabic (compare poor-will), and rapidly reiterated, with a strong accent on the last syllable; a cleft of the beak and some low muffled sounds may also be heard when the bird is very near. The eggs, two in number, are laid on the ground, or on a fallen log or stump, without any nest; they are creamy-white, heavily clouded and marked with brown and neutral tints, neatly equal-ended, and 1.25 by 0.90 inch in size. The young are covered with dirty down. The whippoorwill inhabits the eastern half of the United States and British provinces; it breeds nearly throughout its range, but winters extraliminally. A western variety is sometimes specified as the Arizona whippoorwill; but the place of whippoorwills is mostly taken in the west by the poor-wills, as Nuttall's. Several other species of Antrostomus are found in Mexico and Central and South America.

The moan of the whippoorwill from the hillside; the hooting cry of the tree-toad, that harbingers of storm; the dreary hooting of the screech-owl.

Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 424.

whip-post (hwip'póst), n. Same as whipping-post.

If the stocks and whip-post cannot stay their extravagance, there remains only the jail-house.

The deepest whirl-pit of the rav'nous seas,
B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, ii. 2.

This whirl-pit is said to have thrown up her wracks near Taormenia. Saunders, Travels, p. 192.

whirlpool (hwér'l'pöl), n. [Early mod. E. whirl-pool; whirlpole; *< whirl + pool*¹.] 1. A circular eddy or current in a river or the sea produced by the configuration of the channel, by meeting currents, by winds meeting tides, etc. The celebrated whirlpool of Charybdis between Sicily and Italy, and the Maelstrom off the coast of Norway, are not whirlpools in the strict sense, but merely superficial commotions caused by winds meeting tidal currents, and in calm weather are free from danger. Instances of vortical motion, however, do occur, as in the whirlpool of Ceyrekekan in the Hebrides, between Jura and Scarba, and in some eddies among the Orkneys.

Greedy Whirl-pools, ever-wheeling round,
Suck in, at once, Oars, Sails, and Ships to ground.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Battle of Ivory.

2†. Some huge sea-monster of the whale kind; a whirl-whale; a whirl-about.

The Indian Sea breedeth the most and the biggest fishes that are; among which the whales and whirlpools, called balene, take up in length as much as four acres or arpens of land.
Holland, tr. of Pliny, i. 235. (Trench.)

There was no other water fell over the duke's water-gate than what came of the breaking there of the whirlwater, or, as some call it, the water-pillar.
Court and Times of Charles I., i. 114.

whirl-whale (hwér'l'hwál), n. A monster of the whale kind; a whirl-about; a whirlpool.

Another, swallowed in a Whirl-Whales womb,
Is laid a-live within a living Tomb.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii. The Lawe.

whirlwig (hwér'l'wig), n. [A var. of whirlwig, perhaps simulating wig in carwig.] Same as whirlwind.

whirlwind (hwér'l'wind), n. [< ME. whyrlwende, quirl-wind, a whirling wind, = D. wervel-wind = G. wirbelwind = Icel. hvirfjandr = Sw. hvirfvelind = Dan. hvirvelind, a whirlwind; as *whirl + wind*², n.] 1. A wind moving in a circumscribed circular path; a mass of air, of which the height is generally very great in comparison with its width, rotating rapidly round a vertical or slightly inclined axis, this axis having at the same time a progressive motion over the surface of the land or sea. Whirlwinds vary greatly in dimensions and intensity, the term including the miniature eddy that circles in the dusty street, the towering sand-pillars of the tropical deserts, the waterspout formed over bodies of water, and the destructive tornado of the United States. They arise when the atmosphere is in a condition of instability, and are one of the processes by which a stable condition is regained.

The Lord answered Job out of the whirlwind.
Job xxxviii. 1.

2. Figuratively, any wild circling rush resembling a whirlwind.

There the companions of his fall, o'erwhelm'd
With floods and whirlwinds of tempestuous fire,
He soon discerns. Milton, P. L., i. 77.

What a whirlwind is her head!
Byron.

The deer was flying through the park, followed by the whirlwind of hounds and hunters.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xxi.

To sow the wind and reap the whirlwind. See *wind*².

whirly-bat (hwér'l'i-bat), n. Same as whirlbat.

Very true, and he also propos'd the fighting with Whirly-bats too, and I don't like that sport.
N. Bailey, tr. of Colloquies of Erasmus, I. 84.

whirret (hwir'et), n. [Perhaps from whir.] A slap; a blow. Also written wherret, whirrit, whorrick.

And in a fume gave Furius

A whirret on the ear.
Kendall, Flowers of Epigrams (1577). (Nares.)

I forthwith went, he following me at my heels, and now and then giving me a whirret on the ear, which the way to my chamber lying through the hall where John Ramee was, he, poor man, might see and be sorry for, as I doubt not that he was, but could not help me.
T. Elwood, Life (ed. Howells), p. 222.

Then there's your souse, your wherret, and your dowst, 'Tugs on the hair, your bob of the lips,—a whelp on 't! I ne'er could find much difference.
Fletcher (and another?), Nice Valour, iii. 2.

whisk² (hwisk), n. [*< whisk*¹, v., referring in the orig. form of the game called whisk* and swabbers," to the rapid action and the whisking or sweeping of the cards from the table as the tricks were won. There are various other card terms having reference to quick, sweeping action: e. g., 'sweep the stakes, 'slams, etc. The name whisk, having no very obvious significance after its first application, came to be called whist. See *whist*².] The game of whist.

He plays at whisk and smokes his pipe eight-and-forty hours together sometimes.
Farquhar, Beaux' Stratagem, i. 1.

He played at whisk till one in the morning.
Walpole, Letters, II. 417.

Whisk and swabbers. See swabber.

whisker (hwis'kér), n. [Formerly also (Sc.) whisker, whisker; *< whisk*¹ + -er.] 1. One who or that which whisks, or moves with a quick, sweeping motion.—2. A switch or rod. [Old slang.]

A whip is a whisker that will wrest out blood
Of back and of body, beaten right well.
Harman, Caveat for Cursetors, p. 122.

Purchas.

2. Great; large. Bailey, 1731. [Prov. Eng.] whisky¹, whiskey¹ (hwis'ki), n. [< whisky + -y.] Because it whisks along rapidly. A kind of light gig or one-horse chaise. Sometimes called tim-whisky.

Whiskys and gigs and curricles. Crabbe, Works, II. 174.

The increased taxation of the curriole had the effect of bringing into existence the less expensive gig, a development or imitation of a class of two-wheeled carriage known in the country as a whisky.

S. Dowell, Taxes in England, III. 227.

whisky², whiskey² (hwis'ki), n. [Also Se. whiskey; prob. short for whiskybaugh or some similar form, var. of usquebaugh, < Gael. and Ir. usquebaugh, whisky, lit. (like F. caude vie, brandy) 'water of life,' < usque, water, + baugh, life (cf. L. vita, life, Gr. bios, life). It does not seem probable that E. whisky was taken from Gael. [r. usque simply.] An ardent spirit, distilled chiefly from grain. The term was originally applied to the spirit obtained from malt in Ireland, Scotland, etc., in which sense whisky is synonymous with usquebaugh. Irish whisky and Scotch whisky are still made from malt and are known by numerous names, as poten, mountain-dew, etc. In the United States whisky is commonly made either from Indian corn (corn whisky) or from rye (rye whisky). The name wheat whisky has, however, been appropriated to certain brands, and wheat is probably used in the making of many different kinds or qualities. — Whisky cocktail, a cocktail in which whisky is the principal ingredient; it consists of whisky and water flavored with butters, usually also with the peel of orange or lemon, and sweetened with sugar. — Whisky Insurrection or Rebellion. See insurrection. — Whisky ring, a combination of United States revenue officers and distillers to defraud the government of a part of the internal revenue tax on distilled spirits. It was formed in St. Louis about 1874, extended to other western cities, and secretly acquired great influence in the government, but was broken up in 1875. — Whisky smash, a beverage of which the principal ingredient is whisky flavored with mint which is broken up and mashed in the liquor, and usually also with cranberries, pineapple, or other fruit; a whisky sour with the addition of mint. — Whisky sour, a beverage consisting chiefly of whisky and water, acidulated with lemon juice. — Whisky toddy, toddy of which whisky is the principal ingredient; a beverage consisting of hot water and whisky, sweetened for speed.

whisky-frisky (hwis'fris'ki), a. Flighty. [Colloq.]

As to talking in such a whisky-frisky manner that nobody can understand him, why, it's tantamount to not talking at all.

Mc. Donnell, Cecilia, ix. 3.

whisky-jack (hwis'ki-jak), n. [An altered form, by substitution of the final Jack for John, of whiskey-john.] The gray jack seen now in northern sections and western mountainous parts of North America: the Canada jay, Perisoreus canadensis, related to P. infaustus of northern Europe; the moose-bird. See ent under Perisoreus.

The Canada Jay, or Whiskey-Jack (the corruption probably of a Cree name). Encyc. Brit., XIII. 611.

whisky-john (hwis'ki-jon), n. [A corruption of the Cree Ind. name, rendered whiskue-shauncush by Sir John Richardson, but commonly spelled whiskahoon, < Cree Ind. wisska-tjun. Cf. whisky-jack.] Same as whisky-jack.

whisky-liver (hwis'ki-liv'ér), n. Cirrhosis of the liver, resulting from chronic alcohol-poisoning.

whisp (hwisp), n. An erroneous form of wisp. 4 (like the erroneous form, now established, whisk for wisk).

whisper (hwis'pér), v. [< ME. whisperen, whysperen, whispren, hwispen, whisper, < AS. (ONorth.) hwisprian, whisper, murmur, = MD. wisperen, D. wispelen, whisper, = OHG. wispulan, hwispatun, MHG. G. wispeln, whisper; cf. recent G. wispern, whisper; allied to leel, hriskra = Sw. hriska = Dan. hriske, whisper; imitative words, like whister, whistle, AS. hristian and hwæstri-an, whistle, ult. from the sibilant base hwis-, Cf. whistle.] I. trans. 1. To speak without uttering voice or sonant breath; speak with a low, rustling voice; speak softly or under the breath; converse in whispers; often implying plotting, evil-speaking, and the like.

I'll whisper with the general, and know his pleasure.

Shak., All's Well, iv. 3. 329.

When David saw that his servants whispered, David perceived that the child was dead.

2 Sam. xii. 19.

All that hate me whisper together against me.

Ps. xli. 7.

The hawthorn-bush, with seats beneath the shade —
For talking aye and whispering lovers made!

Congreve, Love for Love, iii. 3.

2. To address or inform in a whisper or low voice, especially with the view of avoiding publicity; elliptical for whisper to.

He did first whisper the man in the ear, that such a man should think of such a card.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 946.

He came

To whisper Wolsey.

Shak., Hen. VIII., i. 1. 179.

You saw her whisper me erewhile.

B. Jonson, Epicene, iv. 2.

He whisper'd the bonnie lassie herself,

And has her favour won.

Katharine Jaquarie (Child's Ballads, IV. 30).

At the same time he whispered me in the ear to take notice of a tabby cat that sat in the chimney corner.

Addison, Spectator, No. 117.

whisper (hwis'pér), n. [< whisper, v.] 1. The utterance of words with the breath not made vocal; a low, soft, rustling voice.

The seaman's whistle

Is as a whisper in the ears of death.

Shak., Pericles, iii. 1. 9.

The inward voice or whisper can never give a tone.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 174.

2. A whispered word, remark, or conversation.

Full well the lassy whisper, circling round,

Convey'd the dismal tidings when he frown'd.

Goldsmith, Des. Vil., i. 203.

I, on his first rising the court was hushed, and a general whisper ran among the country people that Sir Roger was up.

Addison, Spectator, No. 122.

No sound broke the stillness of the night save now and then low whispers from the men, who were standing motionless in the ranks.

Cornhill Mag., Oct., 1888, p. 384.

3. A secret hint, suggestion, or insinuation.

At least, the whisper goes so.

Shak., Hamlet, i. 1. 80.

Princes.

Though they be sometime subject to loose whispers,

Yet wear they two-edg'd swords for open censures.

Fletcher, Valentinian, iii. 1.

I heard many whispers against the other, as a whimsical sort of a fellow.

Steele, Tatler, No. 48.

4. A low, rustling sound of whispering, or a similar sound, as of the wind.

In whispers like the whispers of the leaves

That tremble round a nightingale.

Tennyson, Gardener's Daughter.

5. Specifically, in med., the sound of the whispering voice transmitted to the ear of the auscultator placed against the chest-wall. — Cavernous whisper. See cavernous. — Pig's whisper. See pig.

whisperer (hwis'pér-ér), n. [< whisper + -er.]

1. One who whispers, or speaks in a low, soft, rustling voice, or under the breath. — 2. One who tells secrets, or makes secret and mischievous communications; a talebearer; an informer.

A whisperer separateth chief friends.

Prov. xvi. 28.

Whisperers, backbiters, haters of God.

Rom. i. 29.

Their trust towards them hath rather been as to good spials and good whisperers than good magistrates and officers.

Bacon, Deformity (ed. 1887).

They are directly under the conduct of their whisperer, and think they are in a state of freedom while they can prate with one of these attendants of all men in general, and still avoid the man they most like.

Steele, Spectator, No. 118.

whisperhood (hwis'pér-hüd), n. [< whisper + -hood.] The state of being a whisper: the initial condition of a rumor — that is, a mere whisper or insinuation. [Rare.]

I know a lie that now disturbs half the kingdom with its noise, which, although too proud and great at present to own its parents, I can remember its whisperhood.

Swift, Examiner, No. 14.

whispering (hwis'pér-ing), n. [Verbal n. of whisper, v.] 1. Whispered talk or conversation; a whisper, or whispers collectively.

There was nothing but private meetings and whisperings amongst them, they feeding themselves & others with what they should bring to pass in England.

Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 173.

Even the whisperings ceased, and nothing broke the stillness but the plashing of the waves without.

E. L. Bynner, Begum's Daughter, xxii.

2. Talebearing, hint, or insinuation.

Lest there be . . . whisperings.

2 Cor. xii. 20.

Foul whisperings are abroad.

Shak., Macbeth, v. 1. 79.

whispering (hwis'pér-ing), p. a. [Ppr. of whisper, v.] 1. Like a whisper; low and non-vocal.

The passing of all these hundreds of naked feet makes a great whispering sound over the burning pavements.

Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 224.

2. Emitting, making, or characterized by a low sound resembling a whisper.

The watch-dog's voice that hay'd the whispering wind.

Goldsmith, Des. Vil., i. 121.

To Rosy Brook, to cut long whispering reeds which grew there, to make pan-pipes of.

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, i. 3.

I waded and floundered a couple of miles through the whispering night.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 40.

whispering-gallery (hwis'pér-ing-gal'ē-ri), n. See gallery.

whisperingly (hwis'pér-ing-li), adv. In a whispering manner; in a low voice.

The pool in the corner where the grasses were dank and trees leaned whisperingly.

George Eliot, Middlemarch, xii.

whisperously (hwis'pér-us-li), adv. [*< whisperous (< whisper + -ous) + -ly.] In a whisper; whisperingly. [Rare.]

The Duchess in awe of Carr Vipont sinks her voice, and gabbles on whisperously.

Bulwer, What will he do with it? v. 8.

whist¹ (hwist), interj. [< ME. whist! hush! ef. whisht, hist!, hush!, hush, etc. These are all variations of the utterance st, consisting of a sibilant or low hiss stopped abruptly by the stop-consonant t. This utterance is especially suited to call the attention of one near, and by the lowness of the sound to suggest silence. Cf. whisper, whistle.] Silence! hush! be still!

whist¹ (hwist), a. [Also whisk; < whist¹, interj.] Hushed; silent; mute; still: chiefly used predicatively.

When all were whist, King Edward thus bespake.

Peele, Honour of the Garter.

Far from the town (where all is whist and still).

Marlowe, Hero and Leander, i.

The winds, with wonder whist,

Smoothly the waters kist.

Milton, Nativity, l. 64.

whist¹⁺ (hwist), v. [< whist¹, a. Cf. hist¹, hasht, etc.] I. trans. To silence; still.

So was the Titanesse put downe and whist.

Spenser, F. Q., VII. vii. 59.

II. intrans. To become silent.

In silence then, yshrowding him from sight,
But days twice five he whistled; and refused.
To death, by speech to further any wight.

Surrey, Enchid. ii.

Th' other nipt so nice
That whist I could not

Mir. for Mugs, p. 427.

whist² (hwist), n. [A later form of *whisk*². The change from *whisk*², a word of no very obvious significance after its first application, was prob. orig. accidental, or due to an unthinking conformity to *whist*¹. The notion that the game was called whist "because the parties playing have to be whist or silent," etymologically improbable in itself, is based on the erroneous assumption that whist is the orig. name. The rule of silence, so far as it exists, is appar. founded, however, in part on the false etymology.] A game played with cards by four persons, two of them as partners in opposition to the other two, also partners. Partnership is determined by agreement or by cutting: if by agreement, two players, one on each side, cut for deal; if by cutting, the two who cut the lowest cards are partners, and the original deal belongs to the player who cuts the lowest card. The ace is the lowest card in cutting. Previous to play, the cards (a full pack) are shuffled. The player on the right of the dealer cuts, and the dealer, beginning with the player on his left, distributes in regular order to all the players, one at a time, the cards face downward, except the last card, which he turns face upward upon the table, at his right hand, where it must remain until his turn to play. This is the trump suit; the other three suits are plain suits. The leader is the dealer's left-hand player, who begins the play by throwing one of his thirteen cards face upward upon the center of the table. Second hand, the dealer's left-hand player, follows with a card of the same suit if he holds one; if he does not hold one, with a card of a plain suit (a discard) or with a trump; third and fourth hands similarly follow; and the highest card or the highest trump played takes the trick. The trick is gathered by the partner of the winner; the four cards are made by him into a packet, and placed face downward, at his left hand, on the table. The winner becomes the leader, and the routine is continued until all the cards held are played. Tricks above six in number count a point each upon the score. The score is the record kept of the number of points made. In play the ace is highest, the king, queen, knave, 10, and 9 are also high cards, the 8 is the middle card, and the 7 and 2 inclusive are low cards. The rank of the cards is in the above order; the queen will take the knave, the 6 will take the 5. The ace, king, queen, and knave of the trump suit are the honors. Any trump will take any plain-suit card. The usual practice is to play with two packs of cards, one of these being shuffled or "made up" by the partner of the dealer during the deal, and afterward placed by him on the left hand of the next dealer. The dealer has the privilege of shuffling before the cards are cut. The play is conducted with reference to combinations of cards held. By the system used the cards are made conversational. In English or short whist the table is complete with six candidates. When a rubber has been played by four of these (elected by cutting), the other two have right of entry. The game is of five points made by tricks and by honors as counted. Four honors held by a player, or in conjunction with his partner, count four points; three honors similarly held count two points. The winners of a game score a point (a single) if the adversaries have three or four points up; two points (a double) against one or two points up; and three points (a treble) against no score. A rubber (two games won in succession, or two won out of three) is always played. Two points for the rubber are added to the score of the rubber-winners. When three games are played, the value of the opponents' score is deducted from the winners' total. Exposed cards (cards seen when they should not be played) must be left face upward on the table, liable to an adversary's call; a card led out of turn may be called, or, instead, a card of another suit; cards played upon a trick may by any player be ordered to be placed before their respective players; a player may ask his partner if he holds a card of a suit in which he renounces; and any player may demand to see the last trick that has been turned. In American or standard whist four players form a table. These may agree upon or cut for partners. The game is of seven points, made of tricks and penalties. Credit for all points made by both sides is given, the winner of a rubber scoring the entire number of points made against the entire number made by the opponents. Cards are not called, a trick turned cannot be shown, honors are not counted, and conversation during play is not permitted. Penalties for speaking or demonstration, exposure of cards, or leading out of turn, and for revoking are payable in points after the last card of a hand is played and before the cards are cut for the next deal.

I affirm against Aristotle that cold and rain congregate homogenes, for they gather together you and your crew, at whist, punch, and claret.

Swift, To Dr. Sheridan, Jan. 25, 1725.

Whist is a language, and every card played an intelligible sentence.

James Clay.

At Whist there is a constant endeavor on the part of one side to arrive at the maximum result for their hands by the use of observation, memory, inference, and judgment, their play being dependent from trick to trick on the inferred position of the unknown from observation of the known.

Cavendish, Card Essays, p. 6.

American Whist is recreative work, enjoyable labor, paradoxical as that may seem; its riddle is fascination; its practice is intelligent employment; its play is mathematical induction; its result is intellectual gain.

American Whist Illus., p. 279.

Double-dummy whist. See double dummy, under dummy.—Dummy whist. See dummy, 5.—Duplicate whist, a modification of the game of whist in which by an arrangement of boards, indicators, and counters hands are preserved after having been once played, enabling them to be replayed by the opposing partners.—Fancy whist, any form of play that introduces unauthorized methods. Five-point whist, a game without counting honors, usually played under such short-whist laws as may be applied to it.—Long whist, a game of ten points with honors counting. This was the game of the eighteenth century, played at the English clubs until that of five points with honors counting, called by clay short whist, was introduced.

In the author's opinion long whist (ten up) is a far finer game than short whist (five up). Short whist, however, has taken such a hold that there is no chance of our reverting to the former game. Cavendish, On Whist, p. 51.

Mongrel whist, a game played in accordance with laws or regulations selected from the two authorized methods.

whistert (hwis'ter), v. t. [A var. of whisper, simulating whist.] To whisper; recite in a low voice.

Then returneth she home unto the sickle party, . . . and whistert a certain oddle prayer with a Pater Noster into his care. Holland, tr. of Camden, II. 147. (Davies.)

Just saddle your horse, young John Forsyth,

And whistle, and I'll come soon.

Eppie Morrie (Child's Ballads, VI. 263).

Whistle then to me,

As signal that thou hear'st something approach.

Shak., K. and J., v. 3. 7.

2. To emit a warbling or sharp, chirping sound or song, as a bird.

Latin was no more difficile

Than to a blackbird 'tis to whistle.

S. Butler, Hudibras, I. i. 54.

Hedge-crickets sing; and now with treble soft

The redbreast whistles from a garden-croft,

And gathering swallows twitter in the skies.

Keats, To Autumn.

3. To sound shrill or sharp; move or rush with shrill or whizzing sound.

The southern wind

Doth play the trumpet to his purposes,

And by his hollow whistling in the leaves

Foretells a tempest and a blustering day.

Shak., 1 Hen. IV., v. 1. 5.

A bullet whistled o'er his head. Byron, The Giaour.

4. To sound a whistle or similar wind- or steam-instrument; as, locomotives whistle at crossings.—5. To give information by whistling; hence, to become informer.

I kept eye between him and her, for fear she had whistled.

Scott, Guy Mannering, xxxiii.

To go whistle, a milder expression for to go to the deuce, or the like.

This being done, let the law go whistle.

Shak., W. T., iv. 4. 715.

Your fame is secure; bid the critics go whistle.

Shenstone, The Poet and the Dun.

To whistle down the wind, to talk to no purpose; hold an idle or futile argument.—To whistle for, to summon by whistling.—To whistle for a wind, a superstitious practice among old seamen of whistling during a calm to obtain a breeze. Such men will not whistle during a storm.

"Do you not desire to be free?" "Desire! ay, that I do; but I may whistle for that wind long enough before it will blow."

Johnston, Chrysal, II. 184. (Davies.)

I might as well . . . have whistled jigs to a mile stone.

W. Collins, Moonstone, xxi.

2. To call, direct, or signal by or as by a whistle.

He cast off his friends, as a huntsman his pack,
For he knew when he pleased he could whistle them back.

Goldsmith, Retaliation.

The first blue-bird of spring whistled them back to the woods.

Lowell, Harvard Anniversary.

3†. To send with a whistling sound.

The Spaniards, who lay as yet at a good distance from them behind the Bushes, as secure of their Prey, began to whistle now and then a shot among them.

Bonapier, Voyages, I. 117.

To whistle off, to send off by a whistle; send from the fist in pursuit of prey; a term in falconry; hence, to dismiss or send away generally; turn loose. "Nares remarks, on the quotation from Shakspeare, that the hawk seems to have been usually cast off in this way against the wind when sent in pursuit of prey; with it, or down the wind, when turned loose or abandoned."

If I do prove her haggard,

Though that her jesses were my dear heart-strings,

I'd whistle her off, and let her down the wind,

To prey at fortune. Shak., Othello, iii. 3. 262.

This is he,

Left to fill up your triumph; he that basely

Whistled his honour off to the wind

Fletcher, Bonduca, iv. 3.

whistle (hwis'tl), n. [< ME. whistell, whistell, whystell, wistell, < AS. hwistle, a whistle, a pipe; see whistle, v.] 1. A more or less piercing or sharp sound produced by forcing the breath through a small orifice formed by contracting the lips; as, the merry whistle of a boy.—2. Any similar sound. Especially—(a) The shrill note of a bird.

The great plover's human whistle.

Tennyson, Geraint.

(b) A sound of this kind produced on an instrument, especially one of the instruments called whistles. See def. 3.

Ship boys . . .

Hear the shrill whistle which doth order give.

Shak., Hen. V., iii. 1. Prol.

Sooner the whistle of a mariner

Shall sleeke the rough curls of the ocean back.

Murston, What You Will, v. 1.

(c) A sound made by the wind blowing through branches of trees, the rigging of a vessel, etc., or by a flying missile. (d) A call or signal made by whistling.

Such a high calling therefore as this sends not for those drossy spirits that need the lure and whistle of earthly preferment, like those animals that fetch and carry for a morsell.

Milton, On Def. of Humb. Remonst.

They [of Scio] have now no domestic partridges that come at a whistle, but great plenty of wild ones of the red sort.

Poecke, Description of the East, II. ii. 9.

3. An instrument or apparatus for producing a whistling sound. Whistles are of various shapes and sizes, but they all utilize the principle of the direct flute or flageolet—that of a stream of air so directed through a tube as to impinge on a sharp edge.

With quistils, & qwes, & other quaint gere,

Melody of mowthe myrthe for to here.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 6051.

A whistle seems to have been a badge of high command in the navy in the sixteenth century. One is mentioned in the will of Sir Edward Howard (1512) as hung from a rich chain.

Fairholt.

Specifically—(a) The small pipe used in signaling, etc.,

Boatswain's Whistle.

by boatswains, huntsmen, policemen, etc. (b) A small tin or wooden tube, fitted with a mouthpiece and pierced generally with six holes, used as a musical toy, often called a ponny whistle. See flageolet. (c) An instrument sounded by escaping steam, used for giving signals, alarms, etc., on railway-engines, steamships, etc. See cuts under steam-whistle and passenger-engine.—At one's whistle, at one's call.

Ready at his whistle to array themselves round him in arms against the commander in chief.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xiii.

Galton's whistle, an instrument for testing the power to hear shrill notes.—To pay for one's whistle, or to pay dear for one's whistle, to pay a high price for something one fancies; pay dearly for indulging one's whim, caprice, fancy, or the like. The allusion is to the story Benjamin Franklin tells (Works, ed. 1836, II. 182) of his setting his mind upon a common whistle and buying it for four times its real value.

If a man likes to do it, he must pay for his whistle.

George Elliot, Daniel Deronda, XXV. (Daries.)

To wet one's whistle, to take a drink of liquor, perhaps with reference to the wetting of a wooden whistle to improve the tone, perhaps merely in comparison of the throat and vocal organs with a musical instrument. Sometimes, erroneously, to whet one's whistle. [Colloquial and jocose.]

As any jay she light was and jolly,

So was his jolly whistle wet jolly.

Chaucer, Reeve's Tale, l. 235.

I wet my whistell, as good drinkers do. Je croque la pie. Will you wet your whistell? Pulsgate, p. 780.

Worth the whistle, worth the trouble or pains of calling for.

I have been worth the whistle. Shak., Lear, iv. 2. 29.

whistle-belly (hwis't-bel'i), n. That causes rumbling or whistling in the belly. [Slang.]

"I thought you wouldn't appreciate the widow's tap," said East, watching him with a grin. "Regular whistle-belly vengeance, and no mistake!"

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Oxford, II. xviii.

whistle-cup (hwis't-kup), n. A drinking-cup having a whistle appended, awarded, as a prize in a drinking-bout, to the last person able to blow it.

whistle-drunk (hwis't-drumk), a. Too drunk to whistle; very drunk. [Slang.]

He was indeed, according to the vulgar phrase, whistle-drunk; for, before he had swallowed the third bottle he became so entirely overpowered that, though he was not carried off to bed till long after, the parson considered him as absent. Fiddling, Tom Jones, xii. 2. (Daries.)

whistle-duck (hwis't-duk), n. 1. Same as whistler, 1 (c).—2. Same as whistling.

whistle-fish (hwis't-fish), n. A rockling; specifically, the three-bearded rockling; same as sea-louch. Also weasel-fish.

I believe . . . that, while preserving the sound of the name, the term has been changed, and a very different word substituted, and that for whistle-fish we ought to read weasel-fish. Both the Three and Five-bearded Rocklings were called muscus from the days of Pliny to those of Rostkiet, and thence to the present time.

Farrall, British Fishes, II. 272.

whistler (hwis't-ler), n. [< ME. whistlere, whistlere, < AS. hwistlere, a whistler, piper, < hwist, whistle; see whistle.] 1. One who or that which whistles.

2. White, Fair, Blond, Clear. As to complexion, white expresses that which has too little color for naturalness or health; that is fair which agreeably approaches white; that is clear which is free from blotch; there is a clear brown or olive as well as a clear blond. Blond is fair in distinctive application to the color of the human skin—properly to that of females.

II. n. [C. ME. hwite, the white, whiteness, fairness; cf. OHG. wiz, leel, hriti.] 1. A highly luminous color, devoid of chroma, and therefore indeterminate in hue. But a white intensely illuminated has a yellow effect, and very deeply shaded takes on the bluish look of gray. A derangement of the proportions of light in pure white to the extent of 3 per cent. of the red, 6 per cent. of the green, or 5 per cent. of the blue, is readily perceived by direct comparison; but quite considerable admixtures of chroma are compatible with the color's retaining the name of white.

My Nan shall be the queen of all the fairies.

Fairly attired in a robe of white.

Shak., M. W. of W., iv. 4. 72.

2. A pigment of this color.—3. Something, or a part of something, having the color of snow. Specifically.—(a) The central part in the butt in archery, which was formerly painted white; the center or mark at which an arrow or other missile is aimed; hence, the thing or point aimed at.

See ent under Conepatus. — White-backed woodpecker, a three-toed woodpecker of North America, Picoides dorsalis of Baird, having a long white stripe down the middle of the black back.

whitebait (hwit'hät'), n. 1. A small clupeoid fish, prized as a delicacy in England. Whitebait are best when from 2 or 3 inches long, but retain the name up to a size of 4 or 5 inches. They abound in the estuary of the Thames and in other similar British localities at certain seasons. The fishing begins in April, and lasts through the summer; the fishes are taken in bag-nets. They are chiefly of a silvery-white color inclining to a pale-greenish on the back. Some places in England, as especially Greenwich, are famous for their whitebait dinners. The fish are usually fried till they are crisp. The identity of whitebait has been much discussed and disputed. They have been supposed to be a distinct species, named Clupea alba, and even placed in a genus framed for their reception as Ropidia alba. They have been more generally recognized as the fry of certain clupeoids, as the sprat (Clupea sprattus), the herring (C. horongus), and the shad (of one or another of the British species). But careful examinations of great quantities of whitebait, made in different localities at different times, have shown these opinions to be more or less erroneous. Whitebait consists in fact of the fry of several different clupeoid fishes, namely the sprat and the herring, with occasionally a small percentage of yet other fishes, and the relative quantity of the different species represented varies, more or less, from season and locality.

One whitebait, without whose sanction no good man would touch a fish, was whitebait in the face) gave us permission to do this sort of torment. Thackeray, Philip, xl. 2. A small, eel-like, eeloid fish, Sahtus sinensis. See Sahtus.

2. [cap.] A member of an illegal agrarian association formed in Ireland about the year 1761, whose object was "to do justice to the poor by restoring the ancient commons and redressing other grievances" (Lecky). The members of the association assembled at night with white frocks over their other clothes (whence the name), threw down fences, and leveled inclosures (being hence also called levelers), destroyed the property of harsh landlords or their agents, the Protestant clergy, the tithe-collectors, and any others who had made themselves obnoxious to the association. Also used attributively.

Unlike ordinary crime, the White-boy outrages were systematically, skillfully, and often very successfully directed to the enforcement of certain rules of conduct.

Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xvi.

Whiteboyism (hwit'boi-izm'), n. [< Whiteboy + -ism.] The principles or practices of the White-boys.

The Catholic bishop of Cloncy, in March, 1762, issued a pastoral urging those of his diocese to use all the spiritual censures at their disposal for the purpose of repressing Whiteboyism.

Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xvi.

white-brass (hwit'brās'), n. An alloy of copper and zinc, in which the proportion of copper is comparatively small. With less than 45 per cent. of copper the color of brass ceases to be yellow, and as the percentage of zinc is increased the color of the alloy passes from silver-white to gray and bluish-gray. Such alloys are brittle and have but a limited use. Some of these white-brasses are sold under the trade names of "Birmingham platinum" and "platinum lead." These are chiefly used for buttons, which are made by first casting and then carefully pressing so as to bring out the ornamental pattern on the surface.

white-breasted (hwit'hres'ted'), a. 1. Having a white breast or bosom.

White-breasted like a star

Fronting the dawn he moved. Tennyson, Enone.

2. Having the breast more or less white: specifying numerous animals. See ent under squirrel-hawk.

white-brindled (hwit'brin'dled'), a. Brindled with white: specifying a British moth, Botys olivalis.

white-browed (hwit'brou'd'), a. In ornith., having a white superciliary streak: as, the white-browed sparrow, Zonotrichia leucophrys.

whitebug (hwit'bug'), n. A bug which injures vines and other plants, as a white scale (which see, under *white*¹).

whitecap (hwit'kap'), n. 1. The male redstart, a bird, Ruticilla phanicea. See ent under redstart. [Shropshire, Eng.] — 2. The tree- or mountain-sparrow, Passer montanus. Imp. Dict. — 3. pl. The common mushroom, Agaricus campestris. — 4. Naut., a wave with a broken crest showing as a white patch; a white horse. — 5. [cap.] One of a self-constituted body or committee of persons, who, generally under the guise of rendering service or protection to the community in which they dwell, commit various outrages and lawless acts.

Whitechapel cart. See cart.

whitecoat (hwit'kōt'), n. A young harp-seal; any seal-pup or very young seal whose coat is white. [Newfoundland.]

The phenomenon so carefully described by him was simply a white-coat, or young six-weeks-old seal.

Blackwood's Mag., July, 1873, p. 54. (Encyc. Dict.)

white-crested (hwit'kres'ted'), a. Having a white crest, as a bird or other animal; as, the white-crested turakoo (see turakoo); the great white-crested cockatoo, Cacatua cristata; the white-crested black Polish fowl; the white-crested spiny rat (see Louches).

white-crowned (hwit'kround'), a. Having the crown or top of the head white, as a bird. The white-crowned pigeon is Columba leucocephala, with the whole top of the head pure-white, inhabiting the West

White-crowned Pigeon (Columba leucocephala).

Indies and parts of Florida. This is a large stout-bodied and dark-colored pigeon, notable as one of the few American forms which most authors continue to regard as congeneric with the Old World species of Columba proper. The white-crowned sparrow is Zonotrichia leucophrys, one of the crown-sparrows, closely related to the white-throated, common in eastern parts of North America, having in the adult the top and sides of the head striped with ashy-white and black.

white-ear¹ (hwit'ēr'), n. A shell of the family Vaukoridae: a vanikoro.

white-ear² (hwit'ēr'), n. [See wheat-ear.] The wheatear or fallow-finch, Saxicola arvensis. See ent under wheat-ear.

white-eared (hwit'ēr'd'), a. Having white ears: (a) as a bird whose auricular feathers are white; (b) as poultry with large white earlobes. — White-eared thrush. See thrush.

white-eye (hwit'ī'), n. 1. In Great Britain, the white-eyed duck, Nyroca ferruginea or N. leucophthalma. See ent under Nyroca. — 2. In the United States, the white-eyed vireo or greenlet, Vireo noveboracensis. See ent under Vireo. — 3. Any bird of the genus Zosterops; a silver-eye: as, the Indian white-eye, Z. palpebrosus. See ent under Zosterops.

By most English-speaking people in various parts of the world the prevalent species of Zosterops is commonly called "White-eye" or "Silver-eye" from the feature before mentioned.

A. Newton, Encyc. Brit., XXIV, 824, note.

white-eyed (hwit'ed), a. Having white eyes—that is, eyes in which the iris is white or colorless.—White-eyed pochard. See cut under Nyroca.—White-eyed shad. White-lipped snail, the common garden-snail, girdled snail, or brown snail, Helix nemoralis (including H. hortensis and H. hybridus). Also called white-mouthed snail.

white-listed (hwit'lis ted), a. Having white stripes or lists on a darker ground (the tree in the quotation having been torn with lightning).

He raised his eyes and saw

The tree that shone white-listed thro' the gloom.

Tennyson, Martin and Vivien.

white-livered (hwit'liv'ëd), a. Having (according to an old notion) a light-colored liver, supposed to be due to lack of bile or gall, and hence a pale look—an indication of cowardice; hence, cowardly.

For Bardolph, he is white-livered and red-faced; by the means whereof a faces it out, but fights not.

Shak., Hen. V., iii. 2. 34.

As I live, they stay not here, white-livered wretches!

Fletcher (and another), Eller Brother, iv. 3.

When they come in swaggering company, and will pocket up anything, may they not properly be said to be white-livered?

B. Johnson, Cynthia's Revels, iv. 1.

whitely (hwit'li), a. [< white + -ly.] White; pale.

A whitly wanton, with a velvet brow.

Shak., I. L. L., iii. 1. 198 (folio 1623).

Could I those whitely stars go nigh

Which make the Milky-Way in sky.

Huwell, Letters, ii. 22 (song).

white-marked (hwit'märkt), a. Marked with white, as various animals. White-marked moth, Teneocampa leucographa, a British noctuid.—White-marked tussock-moth, a common North American vapor, Orgyia leucostigma. See tussock-moth, and cut under Orgyia, 2.

white-meat (hwit'mët), n. [< ME. whitmeat; < white + meat.] See white meat, under white.

white-mouthed (hwit'moutht), a. In conch., white-lipped.

whiten (hwit'ün), v. [< ME. hwituan = leel, hwitua = Sw. hwita = Dan. hwida, whiten, become white; as white + -en.] I. intrans. To become white; turn white; bleach; as, the sea whitens with foam.

Whiten gan the orisoumte sheene

At esterward, as it is wont to done.

Chaucer, Troilus, v. 276.

Willows whiten, aspens quiver.

Tennyson, Lady of Shalott.

Fields like prairies, snow-patched, as far as you could see, with things laid out to whiten!

Mrs. Whitney, Leslie Goldthwaite, vi.

II. trans. To make white; bleach; blanch; whitewash; as, to whiten cloth; to whiten a wall.

Drooping lilies whitened all the ground.

Addison, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, iv.

It [the mastie] is chewed only by the Turks, especially the ladies, who use it both as an amusement and also to whiten their teeth and sweeten the breath.

Poocke, Description of the East, II. ii. 4.

The walls of churches and rich Mens Houses are whitened with Lime, both within and without.

Dampier, Voyages, I. 140.

=Syn. Whiten, Bleach, Blanch, Etioleat. Whiten may be a general word for making white, but is chiefly used for the putting of a white coating upon a surface; as, a wall whitened by the application of lime; the sea whitened by the wind. White for whiten is old-fashioned or Biblical. Bleach and bleach express the act of making white by removal, change, or destruction of color. Blanching is done chemically or by exposure to light and air; as, to bleach linen or bones. Blanching is a natural process; celery and other plants are bleached or etioleated by excluding light from them; cheeks are bleached by tea, when the blood retires from their capillaries and leaves them pale. See also defs. 5 and 6 under bleach.

white-necked (hwit'nekt), a. Having a white neck; specifying various animals; as, the white-necked raven, Corvus cryptoleucus, a small raven found in western parts of the United States, having the concealed bases of the feathers of the neck fleecy-white; the white-necked or chaplain crow, Corvus scapularis; the white-necked otary, an Australian eared seal.

whitener (hwit'nër), n. [< whiten + -er.] One who or that which bleaches, or makes white; especially, some chemical or other agent used for bleaching or cleaning very perfectly.

whiteness (hwit'nes), n. [< ME. whytnesse, whitnesse; < white + -ness.] 1. The state of being white; whiteness, or freedom from any darkness or obscurity on the surface.

Says Al Kittib, they [the Moors] displayed teeth of dazzling whiteness, and their breath was as the perfume of flowers.

Fring, Granada, i.

2. Lack of color in the face; paleness, as from sickness, terror, or grief; pallor.

Thou tremblest; and the whiteness in thy cheek

Is apter than thy tongue to tell thy errand.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., i. 1. 65.

3. Purity; cleanness; freedom from stain or blemish.

I am she,

And so will bear myself, whose truth and whiteness

Shall ever stand as far from these detections

As you from duty.

Beau. and Fl., Thierry and Theodoret, i. 1.

He had kept

The whiteness of his soul, and thus men call him wept.

Byron, Child Harold, iii. 57.

whitening (hwit'ning), n. [< Verbal n. of whiten, c.] 1. The act or process of making white.

—2. In leather-manuf., the operation of cleaning and preparing the flesh side of a hide on a beam, preparatory to waxing.—3. Tin-plating. See chemical plating, under plate, v. t.—

4. Same as whiting.

Three bright shillings, . . . which Peggoty had evidently polished up with whitening.

Dickens, David Copperfield, v.

whitening-stone (hwit'ning-stón), n. A fine sharpening stone used by cutlers.

white-pot (hwit'pót), n. 1. A dish made of milk or cream, eggs, sugar, bread or rice, and sometimes fruit, spices, etc., baked in a pot or in a bowl placed in a quick oven. Older recipes differ as to the ingredients, but in its more frequent forms the dish is of the nature of a rice- or bread-pudding.

To make a white-pot.—Take a pint and a half of cream, a quarter of a pound of sugar, a little rose-water, a few dates sliced, a few raisins of the sun, six or seven eggs, and a little mace, a sliced pippin, or lemon, cut sippet fashion for your dishes you bake it, and dip them in sack or rose-water.

Geathrocineta's Delight (1676).

When I show you the library, you shall see in her own hand . . . the best receipt now in England both for a hasty pudding and a white pot.—Steele, Spectator, No. 109.

But white-pot thick is my Buxoma's fare.

While she loves white-pot, capon ne'er shall be,

Nor hare, nor beef, nor pudding, food for me.

Gay, Shepherd's Week, Monday, 1. 92.

24. A drink consisting of port wine heated, with a roasted lemon, sugar, and spices added. N. and Q., 7th ser., VII. 218.

white-pudding (hwit'púd'ing), n. 1. A pudding made of milk, eggs, flour, and butter.—2. A kind of sausage of oatmeal mixed with suet, seasoned with pepper, salt, and sometimes onions, and stuffed into a prepared intestine. Compare black-pudding.

white-rock (hwit'rók), n. In the South Staffordshire coal-field, dikes of diabasic rock which there intersect the coal-measures.

Microscopical examination shows that this white-rock or "white-trap" is merely an altered form of some diabasic or basaltic rock, wherein the felspar crystals, though much decayed, can yet be traced, the augite, olivine, and magnetite being more or less completely changed into a more pulverulent earthy substance.

Geikie, Text-Book of Geol., 2d ed., p. 560.

white-root (hwit'rót), n. The Solomon's-seal, Polygonatum multiflorum, or perhaps P. officinale.

white-rot (hwit'rot), n. See rot.

whiterump (hwit'rump), n. 1. Same as white-tail, 1.—2. The Hudsonian godwit, Limosa hammondi; same as spotrump.—G. Trumbull, 1888, [West Barnstable, Mass.]

white-rumped (hwit'rump't), n. Having a white rump or white upper tail-coverts; specifying various birds.—White-rumped petrel, Leach's petrel, Cantharellus leucorhynchus, of a fuliginous color with white upper tail-coverts; found on both east and west coasts of the United States.—White-rumped sandpiper, Bonaparte's sandpiper, Tringa or Aethya bonapartei, having white upper tail-coverts; abundant in many parts of North America.—White-rumped shrike, the common American shrike, a variety of the loggerhead, Lanius ludovicianus excubitorides.—White-rumped thrush. See thrush.

white-sided (hwit'sí'ded), n. Having the sides white, or having white on the sides; as, the white-sided dolphin, or skunk-porpoise. See cut under Lepororhynchus.

whitesmith (hwit'smith), n. [< white + smith, cf. blacksmith.] 1. A worker in tinware.—2. A worker in iron who finishes or polishes the work, in distinction from one who forges it.

whitespot (hwit'spót), n. 1. A British noctuid moth, Donachyia albimaculata.—2. Another British moth, Leophaea ochromaculata.

white-spotted (hwit'spót'ed), n. Spotted with white; as, the white-spotted pinion, Calymene definis, a British noctuid; the white-spotted pug, Eupithecia albapectata, a British geometrid moth.

whitespur (hwit'spúr), n. In her., a title given to a certain class of esquires, from the spurs which they wore at their creation. Also called esquires' white-spurs.

whitester, whitster (hwit'stér, hwit'stér), n. [Early mod. E. whitstare, whitstare, whitstare, < ME. whitstare; < white + -stare.] A bleacher; a whitener. [Obsolete or local.]

Carry it among the whitsters in Datchet-mead.

Shaks., M. W. of W., iii. 3. 14.

White's thrush. A ground-thrush, Geothlypis (Oreocinchla) varia. This bird was originally described as Turdus varius by Pallas, 1811; as T. aureus by Holandre, 1828; and as T. whitei by Eyton, 1836, when it was found as a straggler to Great Britain, and dedicated to G. White of Selborne; it is also known as Oreocinchla aurea, O. whitei, and by other names. By some singular misapprehension White's thrush has been said to be "the only known bird which is found in Europe and America and Australia alike"—the facts being (1) that various birds are so found, but no thrushes of any kind are so found; (2) that White's thrush has never been found either in America or in Australia, and has been found in Europe as an accidental visitant only, its habitat being as given under ground-thrush (which see); (3) that the supposed White's thrush of Australia is G. lunulata (Turdus lunulatus of Latham), and the true White's thrush, occurring as a straggler in Europe, was mistakenly recorded as Turdus lunulatus by Blasius in 1862; whence a part of the myth, which in its rounded-out form extended to America.

whitestone (hwit'stón), n. A literal translation of the German Weisstien, the name of a rock now generally known as granulite, but sometimes called leptinite. The name Weisstien is now obsolete in Germany, and whitestone has very rarely been used by English writers on lithology.

whitetail (hwit'táil), n. [Formerly also whit-tail; < white + tail. Cf. whiterump, whitcar.] 1. The wheatear or stonechat, Saxicola aurantia. Also white-rump, white-arse, whittok, etc. See cut under wheatear.—2. A humming-bird of the genus Urochroa (which see, with cut).—3. The white-tailed deer of North America, Cariacus virginianus; in distinction from the blacktail (C. macrotis). See white-tailed deer (under white-tailed), and cut under Cariacus.

white-tailed (hwit'táild), n. Having the tail more or less completely white; noting various birds and other animals.—White-tailed buzzard, Buteo albocaudatus, a fine large hawk of Texas and southward, having the tail and its coverts white with broad black subterminal zone, and many fine zigzag blackish lines.—White-tailed deer, the commonest deer of North America, Cariacus virginianus; the whitetail. The tail is very long and broad, of a flattened lanceolate shape, and on the upper side concolor with the back; but it is pure-white underneath, and very conspicuous when hoisted in flight. See cut under Cariacus.—White-tailed eagle, Haliaeetus albicilla, the common sea-eagle or eagle of Europe, etc.—White-tailed emerald, Etheira chionura, a small humming-bird, 3½ inches long, chiefly green, but with the crissal and tail feathers white, the latter tipped with black. This species inhabits the United States of Colombia (Veragua) and Costa Rica. A second is E. cypriceps, little different. The feature named is unusual in this family. Compare Urochroa (with cut) and Urosticte.

White-tailed gnu, Catoblepas gnu, the common gnu, in distinction from C. gorgon, whose tail is black. See cut under gnu.—White-tailed godwit, Limosa uropigialis, a species widely distributed, closely resembling the bar-tailed godwit.—White-tailed kite, the black-shouldered kite of the United States, Elanus leucurus. See cut under kite.—White-tailed longspur, the black-shouldered or chestnut-collared longspur, Centropus ornatus, a very common fringilline bird of the western parts of North America.—White-tailed marlin. See marlin (b).—White-tailed mole, Talpa leucura, an Indian species.—White-tailed ptarmigan, Lagopus leucurus, a ptarmigan peculiar to the Rocky Mountain region of North America, in winter pure-white all over, including the tail, contrary to the rule in this genus. The nearest approach to this condition is found in L. himalayensis of Spitzbergen.

white-thighed (hwit'thíid), n. Having the femoral region white, or having white on the thighs; as, the white-thighed colobus, Colobus vellerosus, a semnopithecoid ape of Africa.

Common Whitethroat Sylvia cinerea.

white-thorn (hwit'thörn), n. [< ME. whythe thorne, withthorn; < white + thorn.] See thorn, 1.

whitethroat (hwit'thrót), n. 1. One of several small singing birds of the genus Sylvia, found in the British Islands. The common whitethroat is S. cinerea. The lesser whitethroat is S. curruca. The garden-whitethroat is S. hortensis, also called billy whitethroat and greater pettichaps. See cut in preceding column.

2. The white-throated sparrow, or peabody-bird, of the United States, Zonotrichia albicollis.—3. A Brazilian humming-bird, Lucochloris albicollis. The character implied in the name is very unusual in this family.

white-throated (hwit'thrō'ted), n. Having a white throat; specifying many birds and other animals; as, the white-throated sparrow, Zonotrichia albicollis, the most abundant kind of crown-sparrow found in eastern parts of the United States. See cut under Zonotrichia.—White-throated blue warbler. See warbler.—White-throated finch. See finch.—White-throated monitor, a South African varan, Monitor albigularis.—White-throated thickhead. Same as thunder-bird, 1.—White-throated warbler. See warbler.

whitetip (hwit'típ), n. A humming-bird of the genus Croiste.

white-top (hwit'tóp), n. A grass, the white bent, or fiorin, Agrostis alba.

white-tree (hwit'tré), n. A tree of Australia and the Malay archipelago, Melaleuca Leucadendron, a probable variety of which, M. minor, furnishes cajuput-oil.

whitewall (hwit'wáil), n. Same as white-baker. [Prov. Eng.]

whitewash (hwit'wosh), n. 1. A wash or liquid composition for whitening something. Especially—(a) A wash for making the skin fair.

The clergy . . . were very much taken up in reforming the female world; I have heard a whole sermon against a whitewash.—Addison, Guardian, No. 116.

(b) A composition of quicklime and water, or, for more careful work, of whitening, size, and water, used for whitening the plaster of walls, woodwork, etc., or as a freshening coating for any surface. It is not used for fine work.

Some dilapidations there are to be made good; . . . but a little glazing, painting, whitewash, and plaster will make it [a house] last thy time.—Fanbrugh, Relapse, v. 3.

2. False coloring, as of character, alleged services, etc.; the covering up of wrong-doing or defects; as, the investigating committee applied a thick coat of whitewash. [Colloq.]—3. In base-ball and other games, a contest in which one side fails to score. [Colloq.]

whitewash (hwit'wosh), v.; pret. and pp. whitewashed, pp. whitewashing. [< whitewash, n.] I. trans. 1. To cover with a white liquid composition, as with lime and water, etc.

There were workmen pulling down some of the old hangings and replacing them with others, altering, repairing, scrubbing, painting, and whitewashing.

Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, xliii.

2. To make white; give a fair external appearance to; attempt to clear from imputations; attempt to restore the reputation of. [Colloq.]

A whitewashed Jacobite; that is, one who, having been long a non-juror, . . . had lately qualified himself to act as a justice, by taking the oaths to Government.

Scott, Rob Roy, vii.

Whitewashed, he quits the politician's strife

At ease in mind, with poekles filled for life.

Lowell, Tempora Mutantur.

3. To clear by a judicial process (an insolvent or bankrupt) of the debts he owes. [Colloq.]—4. In base-ball, etc., to beat in a game in which the opponents fail to score.

II. intrans. To become coated with a white inflorescence, as some bricks.

The bricks made from them [clays on the Hudson River] usually "whitewash" or "salt-petre" upon exposure to the weather.

C. T. Davis, Bricks, etc., ii. 44.

whitewasher (hwit'wosh'ér), n. [< whitewash + -er.] One who whitewashes.

white-water (hwit'wá'tér), n. A disease of sheep.

white-water (hwit'wá'tér), v. i. To make the water white with foam by loblolling, or splashing with the flukes, as a whale; as, "There she white-waters!" a cry from the masthead.

E. Johnson, Tale of a Tub, Prolog.

Whitsuntide (hwit'sun-tid), n. [< ME. whitsuntide, witsuntide, whyssontide, whitesun-tide, whitsuntide; < Whitsun + tide.] The season of Pentecost, comprehending the entire week which follows Pentecost Sunday. In the Church of England Whitsunday was appointed in 1549 as the day on which the reformed Book of Common Prayer was to be used for the first time. Whitsuntide, along with Easter, was one of the two great seasons for baptism in the ancient church, and received the name of White Sunday (Dominica Alba) from the albis or white robes of the newly baptized, as Low Sunday was also called Alb-Sunday (Dominica post Albas or in Albis depositis). See Pentecost.

The weke afore witsuntide come the kyng to Cardoell, and when he was come he axed Merlin how he hadde spiedde.

Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i. 60.

The king then left London for the North a little before Whitsuntide, as the contemporary writer of Troyland tells us.

J. Gairdner, Richard III., vi.

Whitsun-week (hwit'sun-wēk), n. [< ME. whitsun weke, wyltsun-weke; < Whitsun + week.] The week which begins with Whitsunday.

So it befelle that this Emperour cam, with a Cristene Knight with him, into a Chirche in Egypt; and it was the Saturday in Wytton weke.

Manderly, Travels, p. 220.

whittaw (hwit'ä), n. [Appar. for whittawer.] Same as whit-tawer.

Men are busy there mending the harness, under the superintendence of Mr. Goby the whittaw, otherwise saddler.

George Eliot, Adam Bede, vi.

whit-tawer (hwit'ä'ēr), n. [< whitt¹ for whitt¹ + tawer. Cf. whittier.] A worker in white leather; especially, a saddler. Hallivell.

whitten (hwit'n), n. [Appar. < whitt¹ + -en, orig. adj. inflection-ending.] A name assigned in some old books to the guelder-rose, Viburnum Opulus (also called snowball-tree), but properly belonging to the wayfaring-tree, F. Lantana, alluding to the white under surface of its leaves, and so used in large portions of England.

whittie-whattie (hwit'i-hwot i), n. [A varied reduplication; cf. twittle-beath.] Vague, shuffling, or enjoining language; hence, a person who employs cajolery or other deceptive means to gain an end. Jameson. [Scotch.]

whittie-whattie (hwit'i-hwot i), v. i. [Sc.] To mutter; whisper; waste time by vague enjoining language; talk frivolously; shilly-shally. [Scotch.]

What are ye whittie-whatties about, ye gowk?" said his eldest sister, who suspected the tenor of his murmurs.

Scott, Pirate, vi.

whittle¹ (hwit'l), n. [< ME. whittel, hwitel, < AS. hwerfel = hwel, hwitell = Norw. hwitell, a blanket or mantle, lit. a 'white mantle,' < hwit, white. Cf. E. blank, etc., ult. < F. blanc, white.] Originally, a blanket; later, a coarse shaggy mantle or woollen shawl worn by West-country women in England. [Old and prov. Eng.]

When she streyneth hym to tye the straw is his whitel.

So for his glotony and covetysynge he hath a greuous penance.

P. Pl. a monk (C), xvii. 76.

Her figure is tall, graceful and slight, the severity of its outlines softening with the softness of her dress, with the brown stuff gown, and plumed whith.

Kingsley, Two Years Ago, ii.

whittle² (hwit'l), n. [Altered for thrittle, < ME. thrittel, a knife, lit. 'a cutter.' AS. thoritan, E. thrite, dial. white, cut: see thrite.] A knife; especially, a large knife, as a butcher's knife or one carried in the girdle.

There's not a whittle in the nursery camp.

Shak., T. of A., v. 1. 183.

The long crooked whittle is gleaming and bare!

Burham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 56.

I've heard tell as whalers wear knives, and I'd ha' gien t' have a taste of my whittle if I'd been cotted up just as I'd set my foot on shore.

Mrs Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, iv.

whittle² (hwit'l), v.: pret. and pp. whittled, pp. whittling. [Formerly also whittle: < whittle², n.] 1. trans. 1. To cut or dress with a knife; form with a whittle or knife: as, to whittle a stick.

I asked about a delightful jumping-jack which made its appearance, and wished very much to become the owner, for it was curiously whittled out and fitted together by Mr. Feaby's own hands.

The Atlantic, LXV. 88.

2. To pare, or reduce by paring, literally or figuratively.

We have whittled down our loss extremely, and will not allow a man more than three hundred and fifty English shain.

Walpole, Letters, II. 60.

3. To intoxicate; make tipsy or drunk. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

After the Britans were wel whittled with wine, he fell to taunting and girding at them.

Versteegen, Rest of Decayed Intelligence (ed. 1628), p. 230.

II. intrans. 1. To cut wood with a pocket-knife, either aimlessly or with the intention of forming something; use a pocket-knife in cutting wood or shaping wooden things.

Here is a boy that loves to run, swim, . . . make faces, whittle, fish, tear his clothes.

O. W. Holmes, Professor, viii.

The Meggar boys . . . produce knives simultaneously from their pockets, split each a good splinter off the palings, and begin whittling.

W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 264.

2. To confess at the gallows. [Cant.]

When his last speech the fond hawkers did cry,

He swore from his cart, it was all a damn'd lie! . . .

Then said, I must speak to the people a little.

But I'll see you all damn'd before I will whittle.

Swift, Clever Tom Clinch.

Whittlesey (hwit'l-si-i), n. [Named after C. Whittlesey (see def.).] The generic name of a plant first found by Charles Whittlesey in the coal-measures at Cuyahoga Falls, Ohio, and named by J. S. Newberry in honor of its discoverer (1853). This plant is known only by its leaves, of which the nervation is very peculiar, excluding it from all other known genera. The generic characters, as given by Lesquerex, are—"frond simple or pinnate, nerves fasciculate, confluent to the base, not dichotomous, fructification unknown." The leaves have a peculiar truncate form, are somewhat fan-like in shape, and dentate at the upper border, but entire on the sides and rapidly narrowing into a short petiole. This plant, of which the nervation has some analogy with that of the ginkgo, was placed by Lesquerex with the Noegadathese; Schenk considers it as possibly belonging to the gymnosperms. Whittlesey has been found in various localities, always low down in the coal-measures.

whittle-shawl (hwit'shāl), n. Same as whittlet¹.

whittlings (hwit'lingz), n. pl. Chips or bits produced in whittling.

whitwall (hwit'wāl), n. Same as witwall.

Whitwell stove. One of various forms of stove, on the regenerative principle, which are used for heating the air for the supply of an iron furnace working with the hot-blast. The heating-surfaces in the Whitwell stove consist of broad spaces and flat walls instead of the checkerwork usually employed. Such stoves have been built having a height of 70 feet and a diameter of over 20.

Whitworth gun. See gun¹.

whity (hwit'i), n. [< whitt¹ + -y¹.] Rather white; whitish.

whity-brown (hwit'i-bronn), n. Of a whitish color with a brownish tinge; light yellowish-gray: as, whity-brown paper. Different shades of paper have at different times been so designated.

whityer (hwit'yēr), n. [< whitt¹ + -yer, -ier¹. Cf. whiter, whittier.] The word survives in the surname Whittier. A bleacher; a whitster.

whiz, v. and n. See whizz.

whizzig, n. A mechanical toy.

whizlet (hwiz'l), v. i. [A freq. of whiz.] To whizz; whistle. [Rare.]

Rush do the winds forward through perst chineck narrolye whizbing.

Stanhurst, Æneid, l. 93.

whizz, whiz (hwiz), v. i.: pret. and pp. whizzed, pp. whizzing. [= hwel, hriisa, hiss, run with a hissing sound, said of streams, etc.; an imitative word, like hiss, buzz, whistle, etc.] 1. To make a humming or hissing sound, like that of an arrow or ball flying through the air.

God, in the whizzing of a pleasant wind,
Shall march upon the tops of mulberry trees,
To cool all breasts that burn with any griefs,
As whilom he was good to Moyses' men.

Peele, David and Bethsabe.

The exhalations whizzing in the air

Give so much light that I may read by them.

Shak., J. C., ii. 1. 44.

2. To move, rush, or fly with a sibilant humming sound.

How the quoit

Whizzed from the Stripling's arm.

Wordsworth, Excursion, vii.

Parried a musket ball with a small sword, inasmuch that he absolutely felt it whiz round the blade.

Ireing, Sketch-Book, p. 442.

whizz, whiz (hwiz), n. [< whizz, v.] A sound between hissing and humming; a sibilant or whistling hum, such as that made by the rapid flight of an arrow, a bullet, or other missile through the air.

Every soul it passed me by,

Like the whizz of my cross-bow!

Coleridge, Ancient Mariner, iii.

whizzer (hwiz'ēr), n. A centrifugal machine used for drying sugar, grain, clothes, etc.

From the whizzer the wheat passes to the smut machine.

The Engineer, LXV. 2.

Ritchie's Steam Whizzer.—A machine for treating musty grain.

Sci. Amer., N. S., LVIII. 178.

whizzingly (hwiz'ing-li), adv. [< whizzing, pp., + -ly².] With a whizzing sound.

Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? to his own master he standeth or falleth.

Rom. xiv. 4.

Please to know me likewise. Who am I?

Why, one, sir, who is lodging with a friend

Three streets off.

Browning, Fra Lippo Lippi.

Mr. Talboys inquired, "Who were these people?" "O, only two humble neighbors," was the reply.

C. Reade, Love Me Little, iii.

(b) In exclamatory sentences, interrogative in form but expecting or admitting no reply: as, who would ever have suspected it?

Our heir-apparent is a king!

Who dream'd, who thought of such a thing?

Shak., Pericles, iii. Prolog., l. 38.

B. rel. Introducing a dependent clause, and noting as antecedent a subject, object, or other factor, expressed or understood, in a clause actually or logically preceeding. (a) With reference to the clause following, the relative may introduce—(1) A subordinate proposition explanatory or restrictive of the antecedent.

Ydolatric thus was boren,

For quam mani man is for-loren.

Genesis and Exodus (E. E. T. S.), l. 696.

Grant me still a friend in my retreat,
 Whom I may whisper — solitude is sweet.
Cooper, Retirement, l. 742.

The antecedent is sometimes omitted, being implied in the pronoun, which is in this case usually called a compound relative.

Adraweth zoure suerdes & loke seo may do best.
Rob. of Gloucester, l. 127 (Morris and Skeat, II. 6).
 As hi casten heore lot hues he (Christ's garment) scoule

Her we ask'd of that and this.
 And who were tutors.
Tennyson, Princess, l.

(2) A clause dependent in form, but adding a distinct idea.
 Here the relative force is almost entirely lost, who becoming equivalent to and with a demonstrative pronoun.

He trod the water,
 Whose enmity he dung aside.
Shak., Tempest, i. l. 116.

The young man . . . at last married her, to whose wedding, amongst other guests, came Apollonius, who . . .
 found her out to be a Serpent, a Lamia.
Burton, Anat. of Mel, p. 438.

(b) With reference to gender, who originally noted a masculine or feminine antecedent, whether human, animate or other, the neuter being what; and whose, the possessive (genitive) of who, was also that of what, and is still correctly used of a neuter antecedent (see what!). Moreover, before the appearance of the possessive its, whose place was filled by the neuter his (see he), l. c. (b), not only were neuter objects designated in the two other cases by he and him, but who and whom were sometimes substituted for that as the nominative and objective of the neuter relative (see the quotation from Puffenham). In modern use, however, who and whom are applied regularly to persons, frequently to animals, and sometimes even to inanimate things when represented with some of the attributes of humanity, as in personification or vivid description.

Men seyn over the walle stonde

And you, ye stars,
 Who slowly begin to marshal,
 As of old, in the fields of heaven,
 Your distant, melancholy lines!
M. Arnold, Empedocles on Etna, ii.

(c) With reference to the nature of its antecedent, who may note — (1) a particular or determinate person or thing (see (a)); or (2) an indefinite antecedent, in which case who has the force of whoso, whosoever, or whoever, and is called an indefinite relative. Its antecedent may be expressed, or it may be a compound relative.

Haves, Pastime of Pleasure (Percy Soc.), p. 70.

—Syn. Who, which, and that agree in being relatives, and are more or less interchangeable as such; but who is used chiefly of persons (though also often of the higher animals), which almost only of animals and things (in old English also of persons), and that indifferently of either, except after a preposition, where only who or which can stand. Some recent authorities teach that only that should be used when the relative clause is limiting or defining; as, the man that runs fastest wins the race; but who or which when it is descriptive or coordinating; as, this man, who ran fastest, won the race; but, though present usage is perhaps tending in the direction of such a distinction, it neither has been nor is a rule of English speech, nor is it likely to become one, especially on account of the impossibility of setting that after a preposition; for to turn all relative clauses into the form "the house that Jack lived in" (instead of "the house in which Jack lived") would be intolerable. In good punctuation the defining relative is distinguished (as in the examples above), by never taking a comma before it, whether it be who or which or that. Wherever that could be properly used, but only there, the relative may be, and very often is, omitted altogether; thus, the house Jack built or lived in; the man (or the purpose) he built it for. The adjective clause introduced by a relative may qualify a noun in any way in which an adjective or adjective phrase, either attributive or appositional, can qualify it, and has sometimes a pregnant implication of one or another kind; as, why punish this man, who is innocent? i. e. seeing, or although, he is innocent (= this innocent man). But a relative is also not rarely made use of to add a coordinate statement, being equivalent to and with a following pronoun; as, I studied geometry, which I found difficult (and [I] found it difficult); I met a friend, who kindly showed me the way (and he kindly, etc.). This way of employing the relative is by some regarded as a Latinism, and condemned; it is restricted to who and which.

whoa (hwō), interj. [A var. of ho!.] Stop! stand heall, health, healthy, and the second element of wassail: from the Scand. form (Icel. heill) are ult. E. hal?, hail?, etc. The change of initial h to wh was a dial. peculiarity, there being an actual change of pronunciation (hō to hwo), due to the labializing effect of the long o; the change was reflected in the spelling, which in some words, as whole, whoop, whorl, whot, came into literary use, while the orig. pronunciation with simple h remained or prevailed. In dial.

 use the who- (huw-) thus developed was afterward reduced in some districts to wo-, as wo for what (orig. whole) for hot (orig. holt). Whole is one of the words which the American Philological Association and the English Philologiwhore (hōr), n. [With unorig. w, as in whole, etc.; < ME. hore, a harlot (not in AS.), < Teut. hōra, adulteress, = Sw. hora = Dan. hore = D. hor = OHG. huora, huorra, MHG. huore, G. hure (Goth. hōr, f., not found, another word, kalki, being used); also in masc. form, Teut. hōrr = Goth. hōrs, adulterer; cf. AS. hōr, adultery (in comp. hōrcwæn, adulteress), < Teut. hōr = Sw. Dan. hor = OHG. huor, adultery; cf. MHG.

herge, f., a prostitute; OEng. kurra = Pol. kurra = Lith. kurra, adulteress (perhaps < Teut.). Some compare Ir. carann, love, caru, friend, L. cārus, dear, orig. loving (see carress), Skt. chāra, agreeable, beautiful, etc. The word was confused or homilectically associated in early ME. with ME. horu, < AS. horu (horw) = OS. horu, horo = OFries. horu = OIlg. horo, filth, dirt. By some modern writers it has been erroneously derived from *hīr*¹, as if 'one hired,' the notion really present in the equiv. L. meretrix, a prostitute (see meretrix). The vowel in this word was orig. long, and the reg. mod. form would be hoor (hōr), the pron. hōr instead of hōr (as given by Walker beside hōr) is prob. due to the confusion with the ME. hore, filth, and to the later confusion of the initial ho- with who-, as also in whole. The word, with its derivatives, is now avoided in polite speech; its survival in literature, so far as it survives, is due to the fact that it is a favorite word with Shakspeare (who uses it, with its derivatives, 99 times) and is common in the authorized English version of the Bible. The word in all its forms (whoredom, etc.) is generally retained in the revised version of the Old Testament, though the American revisers recommended the substitution of harlot, as less gross; in the revised version of the New Testament harlot (with fornicator for whoremonger, etc.) is substituted. A woman who prostitutes her body for hire; a prostitute; a harlot; a courtesan; a strumpet; hence, in abuse, any unchaste woman; an adulteress or fornicatress. [Now only in low use.]

Do not marry me to a whore. Shak., M. for M., v. 1. 521.

Hee wooed her and sued her his mistress to bee,

And offered rich presents to Mary Ambree. . . .

"A maiden of England, sir, never will bee

The whore of a monarcke," quoth Mary Ambree.

Mary Ambree (Child's Ballads, VII. 113).

Thou know'st my Wrongs, and with what pain I wear

The Name of Whore his Preachment on me pinn'd.

J. Beaumont, Psyche, iii. 184.

whore (hōr), v.; pret. and pp. whored, whor'd, pp. whoring. [= G. huren = Sw. hora = Dan. hore; cf. D. hoeren; from the noun.] I. intrans. To prostitute one's body for hire; in general, to practise lewdness. Shak., Othello, v. 1. 116. [Low.]

II. trans. To corrupt by lewd intercourse. [Low.]

He that hath kill'd my king and whored my mother.

Shak., Hamlet, v. 2. 61

A Vestal ravish'd, or a Matron whor'd,

Are laudable Diversions in a Lord.

Congreve, tr. of Eleventh Satire of Juvenal.

whoredom (hōr'dum), n. [Cf. ME. horedom, hordom, < Teut. hōrdōm = Sw. hordom = OIlg. hoerdom, whoredom; as whore + -dom.] Prostitution of the body for hire; in general, the practice of unlawful sexual commerce. In scripture the term is sometimes applied metaphorically to idolatry—the desertion of the worship of the true God for the worship of idols.

Tamar . . . is with child by whoredom. Gen. xxxviii. 24.

The whole Countrie overfloweth with the synne of that kinde, and noe mervell, as havinge no lawe to restrayne whoredomes, adulteries, and like vicioues of life.

"I'm your man," said he. "Wicket-keeper, cover-point, slip, or long-stop—you bowl the twisters, I'll do the fielding for you."

Wagie Melville, White Rose, II. viii.

wicket-work (wik'et-wérk), n. In coal-mining, a variety of pillar and stall work sometimes adopted in the North Wales coal-field. The headings or stalls (called wickets) are sometimes as much as 24 yards wide, and the pillars as much as 15. Two roadways are generally carried up each wicket.

wicking (wik'ing), n. [*wick*¹ + -ing]. The material of which wicks are made, as in long pieces which can be cut at pleasure.

Generally the traces of musk-cattle are in mass—like balls all melted together. . . . It struck me it would make capital wicking for Esquimaux lamps.

C. F. Hall, Polar Expedition (1876), p. 161.

wickiup, wicky-up (wik'i-up), n. [Amer. Ind.] An American Indian house or hut; especially, a rude hut, as of brushwood, such as is built by the Apaches and other low tribes; in distinction from the tepee of skins stretched on stacked lodge-poles. Wickiups are built on the spot as required, and are not moved.

 To give a wide berth to. See berth. 1. Wide-angle lens. See lens. 2. Syn. Wide, Broad, spacious, large, ample. Wide and broad are synonymous, but broad is generally the larger and more emphatic; a wide river is not thought of as so large as a broad river. Wide is sometimes more applicable to that which is to be passed through; as, a wide mouthed gullet. It is another way of stating this fact to say that wide is more in mind than broad the hunting sides of the throat. Wide is also more generally applicable to that of which the length is much greater than the width, but not to the extension of broad. Each may in a secondary sense be used of length and breadth; as, broad acres, a wide domain.

II. a. 1. Wideness; breadth; extent. [Rare.]
 Emptiness and the waste
 Of that abyss. Tennyson, Two Voices.

Widmannstättian (wid-man-stet'i-an), n. Pertaining to Aloys Beek von Widmannstätt, of Vienna (1753-1849).—Widmannstättian figures, the name given to certain peculiar markings seen on the polished surfaces of many meteoric irons (siderolites) when these have been acted on by an acid. They were first noticed by Widmannstätt in 1808, on the Agram meteorite. The general appearance of these markings may be learned from the annexed figure, which is a copy of a photograph, of natural size, of a part of an etched section of the Laurens county (South Carolina) meteoric iron. The Widmannstättian figures are sections of planes of cleavage or of crystalline growth, along which segregation, or chemical change of some sort, has taken place, and whose form and position with reference to each other are in accordance with the laws governing the development of crystalline substances belonging to the isometric system. Reichenbach divided these figures into what he called a trias (more properly a triad)—namely, kamacite (Balkencisen), taenite (Bandeisen), and plessite (Fullcisen)—the first consisting, so far as has been as yet made out, of distinct plates of iron, with a comparatively small percentage of nickel; the second consisting of thinner plates enveloping the kamacite, and richer in nickel; and the third being a sort of ground-mass filling the cavities, and having less obvious indications of structure and generally a darker color than the others. It has frequently been stated that some meteoric irons do not exhibit the Widmannstättian figures, and that consequently their absence is not a proof of non-celestial origin: it is certain, however, that few, if any, siderolites do not show traces of some kind of structure, although investigators in this branch of science are by no means agreed as to what kind of figures are properly designated by the name Widmannstättian. A somewhat similar uncertainty prevails with regard to the figures developed by etching on the terrestrial iron of Dyfak; so that, at the present time, it cannot be said that the Widmannstättian figures furnish a positive criterion by which the authenticity of a meteoric iron may be established; yet it is certain that well-developed figures of this kind render it highly probable that the specimen in which they are seen is extraterrestrial. A classification of figures which they exhibit, in the present condition of this branch of science, does not seem to be justifiable, although this has been attempted.

[Colloq., U. S.]

The first night of our journey was spent at Ashford, in Connecticut, where we arrived late in the evening; and here the bother of wild cat currency, as it was afterward called, was forced upon our attention.

Joshua Quincy, Figures of the Past, p. 196.

The present system, though an immense improvement in every respect on the heterogeneous old breed of State and wild-cat banks that wrought ruin in 1836 and 1857, is nevertheless of the same dangerous character.

N. A. Rev., CXLI. 129.

Wildcat banking, a name given, especially in the western United States, to the operations of organizations or individuals who, under the loose State banking-laws which prevailed before the passage of the National Bank Act of 1863, issued large amounts of bank notes though possessing little or no capital.

The wild-cat banking which devastated the Ohio States between 1837 and 1860, and misadvised the people of those States until they thought irredeemable government issues an unhoped-for blessing, never could have existed if Story's opinion had been law.

any little will or commission I could execute for you?

Sheridan, The Rivals, v. 3.

4. Expressed wish with regard to the disposal of one's property, or the like, after death; the document containing such expression of one's wishes; especially, in law, the legal declaration of a person's intentions, to take effect after his death. The essential distinction between a will and any other instrument or provision contingent upon death is that a will has no effect whatever until death, and may be freely revoked meanwhile; but a deed which may create or convey an estate in the event of death must take effect as binding the grantor in his lifetime. In English law the word will was originally used only of a disposition of real property to take effect at death, the word testament being then used, as in the Roman and civil law, of a disposition of personal property; hence the phrase, now redundant, last will and testament. In modern usage the term will does not necessarily imply an actual disposition of property; for an instrument, executed with the formalities required by law, in which the testator merely appoints a guardian for his child, or merely nominates an executor, leaving the assets to be distributed by the executor among those who would take by law, is a will. In respect of form, that which distinguishes a written will from other instruments consists in the ceremonies which the law requires for a valid execution, for the sake of guarding against mistake, fraud, and undue influence. Nuncupative wills, however, are not subject to these rules. These formalities are generally four: (1) The testator must subscribe at the end or foot of the writing. (2) He must do so in the presence of witnesses. In some jurisdictions three are required. In some jurisdictions it is enough that he acknowledge to the witnesses that the subscription he has previously made is his. (3) He must at the same time publish the will, that is, declare to the witnesses that it is his will. (4) They must thereafter in his presence and at his request, and in the presence of one another, subscribe their names as witnesses. In some jurisdictions a seal is necessary with the testator's signature. One whose testimony as a subscribing witness becomes necessary to prove it can take no gift by the will.

After Christ had made his will at this supper, and given strength to his will by his death, and proved his will by his resurrection, and left the church possessed of his estate by his ascension, . . . he poured out his legacy of knowledge.

Donne, Sermons, xxviii.

Her last will Shall never be digress'd from.

Ford, Broken Heart, v. 3.

O lead me gently up yon hill, . . .

And I'll there sit down, and make my will.

The Cruel Brother (Child's Ballads, II. 255).

5. Discretion; free or arbitrary disposal; sufficiency; mercy.

ge ar welcum to welde as yow lykez,
That here is, al is yowre awen, to haue at yowre wylle & welde.

Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 836.

He had no true estate in his teneament, but was only a tenant at will or little more, and see at will may leave it.

Spenser, State of Ireland.

But by constreint and force of the sayde foule changeable wether we strake all oure sayles and lay drynnyge in the large see at Godes wyll vnto the nexte mornyng.

Sir R. Gylfarde, Pykryngage, p. 68.

Deliver me not over vnto the will of mine enemies.

Ps. xxvii. 12.

The Prince was so devout and humble that he submitted his Body to be chastised at the Will of Dunstan Abbot of Glasterbury.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 11.

6. The faculty of conscious, and especially of deliberate, action. The will should not be confused (as it is, however, by different writers) with self-control, desire, choice, or attention, although the first and last of these are special modes of volition. Nor is "willing" a table to move automatically across a room an act of will; for experiment shows that effort of this kind, however strenuous, fails to cause even the willer's own hand or foot to move. Normally, the consciousness of action is merged in sensations coming from the member moved; but in cases of anesthesia the agent is still aware of being in action, and even more or less of what he is doing. This consciousness always involves a sense of opposition, whether in the form of a struggle or of a triumph, or in the negative aspect of a sense of freedom. (See freedom of the will, below.) We are always aware of some resistance, be it only the inertia of our limbs. Willing thus essentially involves perceptive sensation, the reflexio of Thomas Aquinas. (See reflexion, 7.) When the real object with which we are in relation is studied with reference to the predicates attributed to it by the senses, the result is experience; but when the predicates we are inwardly inclined to attach to it are studied only, the operation is deliberation, terminating in choice, and commonly followed by acts of will. This cognitive process is the necessary condition of self-control. By a "strong will" is sometimes, and perhaps most correctly, meant great self-control; but more usually a power of bearing down the wills of others by tiring them out and by a domination like hypnosis is intended.

Appetite is the Will's solicitor, and the Will is Appetite's controller; what we covet according to the one by the other we often reject.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, I. viii. § 3.

Everyman is conscious of a power to determine in things which he conceives to depend upon his determination. To this power we give the name of will.

Read, Intellectual Powers, ii. 1.

7. The act of willing; the act of determining a choice or forming a purpose; volition.

Even actual sins, committed without will,

Are neither sins nor shame—much more compell'd.

Fletcher (and another), Queen of Corinth, iii. 2.

It is necessary to form a distinct notion of what is meant by the word volition in order to understand the import of the word Will, for this last word properly expresses that power of the mind of which volition is the act. . . . The word will, however, is not always used in this its proper acceptance, but is frequently substituted for volition, as when I say that my hand moves in obedience to my will.

D. Stewart, Works (ed. Hamilton), VI. 345.

Antecedent will. See Antecedent.—At will. (a) At command; in thorough mastery.

He that can find two words of concord cannot find foure or fife or sixe, vnlesse he haue his owne language at will.

Pattenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 73.

(b) At pleasure; at discretion. To hold an estate at the will of another is to enjoy the possession at his pleasure, and he liable to be ousted at any time by the lessor or proprietor. See estate at will, under estate.

ge schal write of 3oure sone

& him winne a-zen at will.

William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 2955.

We know more from nature than we can at will communicate.

Emerson, Nature, iv.

And if we think of various sensations in parts of our bodies we can produce them at will, and can induce at our pleasure other bodily alterations through emotional excitement.

F. H. Bradley, Mind, XIII. 27.

Conjoint will, joint will, mutual wills, legal phrases often used without much discrimination. Especially—(a) A testamentary act by two persons jointly uniting in the same instrument, as their will, to take effect after the death of both. (b) A similar instrument to take effect as to each on his or her death. These two classes are more properly termed joint or conjoint. (c) Wills made in connection by two persons pursuant to a compact, binding each to the other to make the dispositions of property thus declared. (d) Wills made to bequeath the effects of the one first dying to the survivor. These two classes, and particularly the last, are more appropriately termed mutual. The legal effect of such wills is often a matter of doubt.—Factum of a will. See factum.—Freedom of the will, a mental attribute the existence of which is disputed. The phrase is taken in different senses by different thinkers. (a) The power of doing right on all occasions. (b) That freedom of which we have an immediate consciousness in action. This is, however, only the consciousness of being able to overcome some unspecified resistance to some unspecified extent, which implies and is implied in the fact of resistance, and is in fact but an aspect of the sense of action and reaction. (c) The power of acting from an inward spontaneity, not altogether dominated by motives. This is what most of the metaphysical advocates of the freedom of the will specifically contend for. It is a limitation of the action of causality, even in the material world. Some would restrict the spontaneous power of the mind to making particles swerve without variation of their vis viva; but this is untenable, since the law of action and reaction, which would thus be vitiated, is far more securely proved than that of the conservation of energy, the evidence for which is imperfect, while the objections to it are weighty. It is contended on the one hand that such spontaneity is an indispensable condition of moral action; and on the other that, if it exists, it has no direct reference to morality except this, that, so far as a being is spontaneous in this sense, he is free from the moral law as well as from that of causation, and that there is neither sense nor justice in holding him responsible for mere sporadic effects of pure non-cause. Responsibility, it is argued, ought to imply that a man's conduct can be regulated by principles as efficient causes, and is not free from the influence of causation. Free will, liberty: freedom; liberty as to choice in faith or conduct; also, the faculty of will as being free, or not absolutely subject to causation.

Certainly there be that delight in giddiness, and count it a bondage to fix a belief—affecting free will in thinking, as well as in acting.

Bacon, Truth (ed. 1887).

We thus, in thought, never escape determination and necessity. It will be observed that I do not consider this inability to the notion any disproof of the fact of free-will.

Sir W. Hamilton, Works, p. 611.

Good will. (a) Favor; kindness. (b) sincerity; right intention.

Some indeed preach Christ even of envy and strife; and some also of good will.

Phil. i. 15.

His wills, of his own will; voluntarily.

A thyng that no man wol, his wille, helde.

Chaucer, Troil. to Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 272 (Harl. MS.).

Ill will, enmity; unfriendliness. It expresses less than malice. Compare good-will and ill-will.—Inofficious will. See inofficious.—Joint will, mutual wills. See conjoint will.—Officious will. See officious.—Register of wills. See register.—Roman will, a form of ancient Roman will which in later times was allowed in the Eastern Empire, and generally known as the Roman will, combining something of the form of the manipular will with the efficacy of the Pretorian testament. See testament, Maine.—Simple will. See simple.—Statute of Wills, the name commonly designating a British or an American statute regulating the power to make wills; more specifically, an English statute of 1549 (superseded by the Wills Act), by which persons seized in socage were allowed to devise all their lands except to bodies corporate, and persons seized in chivalry were allowed to devise two thirds; sometimes also called the Wills Act.—Tenant at will. See tenant.—To have one's will, to obtain what is desired.—To work one's will, to act absolutely according to one's own will, wish, pleasure, or fancy; to do entirely what one pleases (with something).

For tho' the Giant Ages heave the hill

And break the shore, and evermore

Make and break, and work their will, . . .

What know we greater than the soul?

Tennyson, Death of Wellington.

Wills Act, an English statute of 1837 (7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict., c. 26) which repealed the Statute of Wills, and enacted that all property may be disposed of by will. It required wills to be in writing, signed at the foot, and attested by two witnesses, and declared the effect of certain words and phrases in them. The amendment of 1852 (15 and 16 Vict., c. 24) relates to the position of the signature.—With a will, with willingness and earnestness; with all one's heart; heartily.

Mr. Herbert threw himself into the business with a will.

willock (wil'ok), n. [Cf. Se. willick, a young heron, also the puffin.] The common fluore or guillemot, Uria troile or Lomvia troile, a bird of the auk family, abundant on both coasts of the North Atlantic. Also willcock. See ent under murri. [Local, British.]

will-o'-the-wisp (wil'o-thê-wisp), n. 1. The ignis fatuus; hence, any person or thing that deludes or misleads by dazzling, visionary, or evanescent appearances. Also will-in-the-wisp, will-with-a-wisp, and Jack o' lantern.

All this hide and seek, this will-in-the-wisp, has no other meaning than a Christian marriage for sweet Mrs. Belinda. Fanbrugh, Provoked Wife, v. 3.

Wicked sea-will-o'-the-wisp!
Wolf of the shore! dog, with thy lying lights
Thou hast betray'd us on these rocks of thine!
Tennyson, Harold, ii. 1.

2. A common fresh-water alga, Nostoc commune; so named from its sudden and seemingly mysterious appearance. See Nostoc.

willow¹ (wil'ô), n. and a. [Also dial. willy; < ME. wilowre, wylow, welloghe, wilwe, wilge, < AS. welig = MD. welighe, wilghe, later wilge, D. wily = MLG. LG. wilge, willow; root uncertain. For other names, cf. *sallow*² and withy.] I. n. 1. A plant of the genus Salix, consisting of trees, shrubs, and rarely almost herbaceous plants. Of the many species a few are of decided economic worth as furnishing osiers (osier willow, crack willow, purple wil- low, white willow), or for their wood (crack willow, white willow), or for their bark, which in northern Europe is esteemed equal to oak-bark for tanning. Many are excellent for fixing loose sands, some serve for hedges, while several are highly ornamental. A few plants with some similarity to the willow have borrowed its name. See osier, sallow, and the phrases below.

Now welgous, bushes, bromes, thing that escheth
Let plantane.
Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 81.

2. The wood of the willow; hence, in base-ball and cricket, the bat.—Almond or almond-leaved willow, a moderate-sized tree, Salix amygdalina, found in wet grounds in the northern old World, having the leaves white, but not silky beneath. It is much cultivated for basket-making. Also French willow.—Babylonian willow (of Psalm cxxvii.), probably a species of poplar, Populus Euphratica. The weeping willow was variegated plumage. It breeds in summer, the wings being marked with white and lined with black; the length is about 10 inches. It abounds in temperate North America, and especially in the United States; it extends north to 50° at least, and throughout its range, and winters in the southern part. Some related tattlers are occasionally mistaken for the species, and called willet by sportsmen. See Sanderling.

Across the dune, curlews, gull, and snipe, water-turkeys, and willets were feeding.
Hesperus, Mag., LXX. 223.

willful, willfully, etc. See willful, etc.

willie, n. A Scotch variant of willie.

willie, a. Same as willie.

willie-fisher (wil'i-fish-er), n. The common tern or sea-swallow. See ent under Sterna.

[Forfar, Scotland.]

willie-hawkie (wil'i-ha'ki), n. The little grebe, or dabchick. C. Scautinson. [Antrim, Ireland.]

willie-man-beard (wil'i-man-bêrd'), n. The sea-stickleback, Spinachia vulgaris. Compare ent under stickleback. [Local, Eng.]

willie-muftie, n. See willie-muftie.

williewaught (wil'i-waucht), n. [< willie (here used with dim. effect) + waught.] A hearty draught of liquor. [Scotch.]

An' we'll tak' a right guid willie-waught
For auld lang syne. Burns, Auld Lang Syne.

willing (wil'ing), a. [< ME. willing; verbal n. of *will¹, *v.] Inclination; desire; intention.

The evil natures, and the evil principles, and the evil manners of the world, these are the causes of our imperfect willings and weaker actings in the things of God.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 13.

once supposed to be the tree, fancy associating its pendulous branches with the hanging of the harps. The oleander is sometimes selected as the tree. Compare weeping willow.—Bay willow. (a) Salix pentandra, a shrub or small tree of Europe and temperate Asia, having broadly ovate or oblong leaves, which are thick, smooth, and shining, rendering it highly ornamental. (b) See willow-herb.—Bedford willow. See crack willow.—Bitter willow. See purple willow.—Black willow. (a) A tree of moderate size, Salix nigra, widely distributed in North America, commonly found bending over watercourses. The wood is of little value; the bark contains salicylic acid, and is a popular domestic febrifuge. See cut on preceding page. (b) The variety Scouleriana of Salix flaccens, found on the western coast of North America, a small tree with the wood light, hard, strong, and tough. (c) Same as bay willow (a). [Local, Eng.]

Brittle willow. Same as crack willow.—Crack willow, a tall handsome tree, Salix fragilis, so called because the twigs break easily from the branches. It is native in Europe and Asia, and is often cultivated, affording, with the closely related white willow, the best willow- timber. A hybrid S. Ruessliana, of this and the white willow is the Bedford or Leicester willow, whose bark is said to contain more tannin than oak-bark, and more salicin than most of the genus. Desert willow, a small tree of willow-like habit Chilopsis saligna, of the Bignoniaceae, found in arid regions in the southwestern United States and northern Mexico. The flowers, borne in terminal racemes, have a funnel-form corolla swollen out above, an inch or two long, colored white and purplish; the pods resemble those of Catalpa.—Diamond willow, a form of the heart-leaved willow (see below) growing on the banks of the Missouri and Yellowstone rivers, having remarkable diamond-shaped scars due to the arrest of wood-growth at the base of atrophied twigs. It is made into unique canes. —Dwarf gray willow. Same as ray willow.—French willow. (a) Same as almond willow. (b) See willow-herb. —Glaucous willow, the pussy-willow. —Glossy willow. Same as shining willow.—Goat willow, the great sawbark, Salix caprea. See willow.—Golden willow or osier. See white willow.—Ground willow, Salix arctica, and perhaps other dwarf northern species. See Salix.—Heart-leaved willow, Salix cordata, the most widely distributed and variable American willow, a tall shrub with the leaves narrow but heart-shaped at the base. A variety, S. vestita, is the diamond willow (see above). Hedge willow, the sawbark, Salix caprea.—Hoop willow. Same as ring willow.—Huntington willow, the white willow. —Leicester willow, the crack willow. —Long-leaved willow. Same as sandbar willow.—Osier willow. See osier; also almond willow, purple willow, white willow.—Persian willow. See willow-herb.—Prairie willow, a grayish shrub, Salix humilis, related to the sage willow, growing 3 to 8 feet high, common on dry plains, etc., in the United States. —Primrose willow. See Jussiaea.—Purple willow, a shrub or small tree, Salix purpurea, found through Europe and temperate Asia. Also called bitter rose, and whipcord willow. Its bark is rich in salicin, and so bitter that it is not gnawed by animals; hence this willow is specially recommended for game-proof hedges. It is at the same time one of the best osier willows. —Pussy willow. See pussy-willow.—Ring or ring-leaved willow, a variety of the weeping willow with the leaves curled into rings. —Rose willow. See purple willow.—Rosebay willow. See willow-herb.—Sage willow. See sage-willow.—Sallow willow, the common sawbark, Salix caprea.—Sandbar willow, Salix longifolia, a small tree often forming dense clumps of great beauty on river sandbars and banks. It is very common throughout the Mississippi basin, and reaches its greatest development in northern California and Oregon. —Shining willow, a river-bank shrub or small tree, Salix lucida, of North America, closely allied to the bay willow of Europe, the leaves with a long tapering point, smooth, and shining on both sides. It is among the most beautiful of willows, and is becoming popular in cultivation. —Silky willow. (a) The white willow. (b) Salix Sitchensis, a low much-branched tree of the Pacific coast from California northward. —Swamp willow, the pussy-willow. —Sweet willow, the sweetgale, Myrica Gale; also, the bay willow. Britton and Holland. [Prov. Eng.] To wear the willow, to put on the trappings of woe for a lost lover.

Tell him, in hope he'll prove a widower shortly,
I'll wear the willow garland for his sake.

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., iii. 3. 228.

Virginia or Virginian willow. See Itea.—Water willow. See water-willow.—Weeping willow, a large tree, Salix Babylonica, distinguished by its very long and slender pendulous branches, a native, not of Babylon, but of eastern Asia, now common in cultivation in Europe and America. Only the female plant is known in western countries, but it spreads to some extent by the drifting and rooting of its broken branches. It is considered an emblem of mourning, and is often planted in graveyards. The Kilmarnock weeping willow is a remarkable variety of the common willow. There is an American weeping willow sold in nurseries, which is a partly pendulous form of the European purple willow. —Whipcord willow. See purple willow.—White willow, Salix alba, otherwise called Huntington and silky willow, perhaps the most common cultivated species, a fine tree becoming from 50 to 80 feet high, the leaves ashy-gray or silky-white on both sides. Its wood is smooth, light, soft, tough, and not subject to splintering, and is used for a great variety of purposes. It makes a good gunpowder charcoal, for which purpose it is grown in New Jersey and Delaware. The typical form is the variety S. carolinensis, or blue willow. The variety S. elaeagnifolia, the golden willow or osier, with yellow twigs, is largely grown for basket-making. —Whortle willow, Salix Myrsinifolia, a low, sometimes closely procrembrant shrub, under a foot high, with small round, ovate, or lanceolate leaves, found in the mountains of the northern Old World.

Willow scale. See scale.—Willow span-worm, one of a number of geometrid larvae which feed upon willow, as the pink-striped, the larva of Delinia variabilis of the United States. Willow tussock-moth, a North American tussock moth, Orygia defuncta, whose larva seems to feed only on willow—a peculiar fact, since other tussock-moth larvae are rather general feeders. Yellow willow, the variety reticulata of Salix alba. See white willow, above.

II. a. 1. Made of the wood of the willow; consisting of willow.—2. Of the color of the bark of young willow-wood; of a dull yellowish-green color. Willow pattern, a design in ceramic decoration, introduced by J. Turner in his Chingley porcelain in 1780. The design is Chinese in character, but is not exactly copied from any Chinese original. It is always in blue on white or bluish-white ground.—Willow tea. See tea.

Willow Pattern.

willow¹ (wil'ô), v. t.; pret. and pp. willowed, ppr. willowing. [< willow¹, n.] To beat, as cotton, etc., with willow rods, in order to loosen it and eject the impurities; hence, to pick and clean, as any fibrous material; treat with the willow or willowing-machine.

Fine stuff, such as willowed rope.

Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 36.

willow² (wil'ô), n. [Also willy, willey; short for willow-machine or willowing-machine.] A power-machine for extracting dirt and foreign matter from hemp and flax, for cleaning cotton, and for tearing open and cleaning wool preparatory to spinning. The machines used for these different materials vary in size, but are essentially alike, and consist of a revolving cylinder armed with spikes in a cylindrical casing also armed with spikes. A part of the casing forms a grid or sieve, through which the waste falls by gravity or is drawn by a suction blast. In certain cotton manufactures it follows the opener, or is used in place of it, and is followed by the scutcher. Also called cotton-cleaning machine, deril, opening-machine, willower, willowing-machine, willow-machine, and willowing-machine.

willow-beauty (wil'ô-bû-ti), n. A British geometrid moth, Boarmia rhomboidaria.

willow-bee (wil'ô-bê), n. A kind of leaf-eating bee, Megachile willughbiella (wrongly willoughbiella), which builds its cells in willows, as originally described by Francis Willughby (1671).

willow-beetle (wil'ô-bê-tl), n. Any one of more than a hundred species of beetles which live upon the willow; specifically, a leaf-beetle, Phyllodecta vitellina, which damages willows in England and on the continent of Europe, its larvae feeding on the leaves and pupating underground.

willow-cactus (wil'ô-kak-tus), n. See Rhipsalis.

willow-caterpillar (wil'ô-kat'ér-pil-är), n. Any one of the many different lepidopterous larvae which feed upon the willow; specifically, the larva of the viceroy (which see).

willow-cimbex (wil'ô-sim-beks), n. A very large American saw-fly, Cimbex americanus.

Willow-cimbex. (Cimbex americanus), natural size.

whose large whitish larvae feed on the foliage of the willow, elm, birch, and linden, frequently entirely defoliating large trees. See Cimbex.

willow-curtain (wil'ô-kér-tân), n. In hydraulic engineering, a form of floating dike made of willow wands, used in western rivers in the United States as a shield against the current, and to prevent the wearing of the banks.

willow-dolerus (wil'ô-dol'ê-rus), n. A small saw-fly, Dolerus arvensis, blue-black in color, found frequently on willows in the United States in May and June.

willowed (wil'ôd), a. [< willow¹ + -ed².] Abounding with willows. [Rare.]

No longer steel-clad warriors ride
Along thy wild and willow'd shore.

Scott, l. of L. M., iv. 1.

willower (wil'ô-êr), n. [< willow¹ + -er¹.] Same as willow².

willow-fly (wil'ô-flî), n. A pseudoneuropterous insect of the family Perlidae; any perlid or stone-fly; especially, one whose larva is used for bait, as the yellow sally, Chloroperla viridis of England, or Nematura variegata of the same country. See cut under Perlæ.

willow-gall (wil'ô-gäl), n. Any one of numerous galls upon willow-shoots and -leaves, made mainly by gall-midges (Cecidomyiidae), but often by gall-making sawflies of the genera Eucra and Nematus. Examples of the former are the pine-cone willow-gall of Cecidomyia strobioides and the cabbage-sprout willow-gall of Cecidomyia salicis brassicoides. Examples of those made by sawflies are the willow apple-gall of Nematus salicis-japonicus, the willow egg-gall of Eucra salicis arum, and the willow bud-gall of Eucra salicis-japonica.

Cabbage-sprout Willow-gall.

willow-garden

(wil'ô-gär-dn), n. A sportsman's name for a swale grown with willows.

Snipe in the spring not unfrequently take to swampy thickets of black alder, and what are known as "willow gardens," with springy bottoms, for shelter and food. Sportsman's Gazetteer, p. 161.

willow-ground (wil'ô-ground), n. A piece of swampy land where osiers are grown for basket-making.

willow-grouse (wil'ô-grous), n. The willow-ptarmigan.

willow-herb (wil'ô-êrb), n. 1. A plant of the genus Epilobium, so named from the willow-like leaves of E. angustifolium, the great willow-herb. This is the most conspicuous species, a native of Europe, Asia, and North America, abounding especially in recent forest-clearings, hence in America also called fire-weed. It grows from 4 to 7 feet high, and bears a long raceme of showy pink-purple flowers. Other (British) names are rose-bay, bay willow, Persian, and especially French willow. E. latifolium of arctic Europe, Asia, and North America, reaching Colorado in the mountains, is a much lower plant with similar showy flowers. E. obovatum is a beautiful dwarf species of the mountains of California. E. luteum, found from Oregon northward, is peculiar in its yellow flowers. Many species are not at all showy. The great willow herb and others have an medicinal medicinal use. The Indian name weewip or weewip survives in some books. See also cut under count.

2. See Lythrum.—French willow-herb, the French willow. See def. 1.—Hooded willow-herb, the skull-cap, Scutellaria.—Night willow-herb, the evening primrose, Oenothera biennis.—Spiked willow-herb, Epilobium angustifolium, formerly E. spicatum.—Swamp willow-herb, Epilobium palustre.

The inflorescence of Willow herb (Epilobium angustifolium). a, capsule, opening; b, seed.

willowing-machine (wil'ô-ing-mä-shên), n. Same as willow².

willowish (wil'ô-ish), a. [< willow¹ + -ish¹.] Resembling the willow; like the color of the willow. J. Walton, Complete Angler, i. 5.

willow-lark (wil'ô-lärk), n. The sedge-warbler. Pennant, 1768. (Imp. Dict.) willow-leaf (wil'ô-lêf), n. One of the elongated filaments of which the solar photosphere appears to be composed, especially in the neighborhood of sun-spots. The name was proposed by Nasmyth, but is no longer in general use, since as a rule the photospheric granules are not of a form to justify it.

willow-machine (wil'ô-mä-shên), n. Same as willow².

willow-moth (wil'ô-môth), n. A common British noctuid moth, Caradrina quadrangulata, a pale mottled species whose caterpillar does much damage to stored grain.

willow-myrtle (wil'ô-mêr-tl), n. A myrtaceous tree with willow-like leaves, Agonis florosa, of western Australia, growing 40 feet high.

willow-oak (wil'ô-ok), n. An American oak, Quercus Phellos, found from New York near the coast to Texas and north to Kentucky and Missouri. Its leaves are narrow and entire, strongly suggesting those of a willow. It grows some 70 feet high, and affords a heavy and strong, rather soft, wood, somewhat used for the floors of wharves and in building. Also peach-oak, sand-pick. See cut under oak.—Upland willow-oak, Quercus cuneata, a tree reaching 45 feet high, found from Fort Ross to Texas on sandy barrens and dry upland ridges. The leaves are somewhat broader than those of the willow-oak, leathery, and white-downy beneath. Also blue-jack and sand-pick.

willow-peeler (wil'ō-pe'ler), n. A machine or device for stripping the bark from willow-wands, as a crotch with sharp edges, through which the wand is drawn. Also called willow-stripper.

willow-ptarmigan (wil'ō-tär'mi-gan), n. The common ptarmigan of North America, Lagopus albus, having in winter white plumage with a black tail, but no black stripe through the eye; distinguished from rock-ptarmigan. Also willow-grouse. The name originally applied to the European bird named L. saliceti. See dubipa and rype.

willow-sawfly (wil'ō-sā'fī), n. Any one of the different sawflies which breed upon willow, as Cimber americana, Dolerus arcensis, Nematus ventralis, and a number of others. Phyllocolpa interpres is a North American species whose larva bore into the young shoots of willow, whence it is specified as the willow-shoot saw-fly. See willow-cimber and willow-dolerus.

willow-slug (wil'ō-slug), n. The larva of any sawfly, as Nematus ventralis, which infests willows. That of the species named, more fully called willow-spotted willow-slug, has some economic consequence in connection with the osier industry.

willow-sparrow (wil'ō-spar'ō), n. Same as willow-warbler. [Local, Eng.]

willow-thorn (wil'ō-thörn), n. Same as sal-lan-thorn. See Hippophaë.

willow-warbler (wil'ō-wär'blēr), n. A small sylviine bird of Europe, Sylvia or Phylloscopus trochilus; the willow-wren. It is about 5 inches long, greenish above, whitish below, and very abundant in summer in the British Islands in woods and copses. See chiff-chaff. Yellow-browed barred willow-warbler. See yellow-browed warbler, under warbler.

willow-weed (wil'ō-wēd), n. 1. One of various species of Polygonum, or knotweed, as P. amphibium, P. Persicaria, or P. lapathifolium. Britton and Holland. [Prov. Eng.].—2. The purple loosestrife, Lythrum Salicaria.

willow-wort (wil'ō-wört), n. 1. The common loosestrife, Lythrum vulgaris, or the purple loosestrife, Lythrum Salicaria.—2. A plant of the order Sabineae, the willow family. Lindley.

willow-wren (wil'ō-rēn), n. The willow-warbler; a common British name and also book-name.

willowy (wil'ō-i), a. [< willow + -y.] 1. Abounding with willows.

Where willowy Camus lingers with delight!
Gray, Ode for Music.

Steadily the millstone hums
Down in the willowy vale.
Bryant, Song of the Sower.

2. Resembling a willow; flexible; drooping; pliable; graceful.

Willisia (wil'si-ä), n. [NL., named after one Willis.] A generic name based on medusoids of certain gymnoblastic hydroid polyps, apparently coryniform, which produce other medusoids toward the other end, acquire the character of complete medusoids. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 132.

Willughbeia (wil'ō-bē'ii), n. [NL. (Roxburgh, 1819), named for Francis Willughby, 1655-72, an English naturalist, who wrote on the use of sap in plants.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Apocynaceae and tribe Carissaeae. It is characterized by climbing stems, flowers in dense cymes with a five-parted salver-shaped corolla bearing its stamens near the base of its tube, and followed by a large globose berry with hard pericarp and abundant pulp, in appearance resembling an orange. By its axillary (not terminal) cymes it is further distinguished from the related climbing genus of india-rubber plants, Landolphia, for which the name Willughbeia has also been used. The genus includes 8 or 10 species, natives of India, Malacca, and Ceylon. They are sarmentose shrubs, generally tendrill-bearing and climbing to great heights. The leaves are opposite, short-petioled, and feather-veined. The W. elastica of many writers, an india-rubber plant of Borneo, is now classed as Ureola.

will-willet (wil'wil'et), n. [Cf. willet, pill-willet.] 1. Same as pill-willet.—2. The American oyster-catcher; as, "the will-willet or oyster-catcher," Bartram, Travels (ed. 1791). Larson, 1709.

will-with-a-wisp, n. Same as will-o'-the-wisp. I. will-worship (wil'wēr'ship), n. [A lit. rendering of Gr. θεολατρεία, < theō + worship.] Worship according to one's own fancy; worship imposed merely by human will, not by divine authority; supererogatory worship.

Which things have indeed a shew of wisdom in will worship.
Col. ii. 23.

Let not the obstinacy of our halfe Obedience and will Worship bring forth that Viper of Sedition that for these Four-score Years hath been breeding to eat through the entrails of our Peace. Milton, Reformation in Eng., ii.

will-worshiper (wil'wēr'ship-ēr), n. One who practises will-worship.

He that says "God is rightly worshipped by an act or ceremony concerning which himself hath no way expressed his pleasure"—is superstitious or a will-worshiper.

Jer. Taylor, Rule of Conscience, II. iii. 13.

willy¹ (wil'i), a. [< ME. willy, willi (= G. willig, willing); < will + -y.] 1. Willing; ready; eager.

All wight men in wer, willy to fight,
And boldly the bekirt, brinnet there fos,
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), i. 7713.

7. To haul or hoist by or as by a winch, whim, capstan, or the like; as, to wind or warp a ship out of harbor; specifically, in mining, to raise (the produce of the mine) to the surface by means of a winding-engine; hoist. The term wind, as well as draw, is often employed in Great Britain, while hoist is generally used in the United States. In the early days of mining, ore and coal were almost exclusively raised by hand, horse, or steam-power, in buckets or kibles; at the present time, in both England and the United States, this is done by means of a winding-engine which turns a drum on which a rope (generally of steel wire) is wound and unwound, and by means of which a cage (see cage, 3 (d)) is raised or lowered, on which the loaded cars are lifted to the surface, and the empties returned to the pit-bottom. The dimensions of engines, drums, and cages in large mines are sometimes very great, as is also the velocity with which the machinery is moved. Thus, in the Monkwearmouth colliery, Durham, England, the winding-drums are 25 feet in diameter, the rope weighs 4½ tons, the cage and load 7½ tons; the vertical distance through which the cage is raised is 550 yards, and the time occupied in lifting it and discharging the cars is two minutes and four seconds.

The Hollanders . . . layd out banisers, and wound themselves out of the way of vs. Hakluyt's Voyages, iii. 710.

Winding-up Act, in Eng. law, an act providing for the dissolution of joint-stock companies, and the winding up of their affairs; more specifically, 7 and 8 Vict., c. 111 (1841); followed and amended by 9 and 10 Vict., c. 28 (1846); 11 and 12 Vict., c. 45 (1849); 12 and 13 Vict., c. 108 (1849); 13 and 14 Vict., c. 83 (1850); 19 and 20 Vict., c. 47 (1856); 20 and 21 Vict., c. 49, c. 78 (1857); and superseded by 'The Companies' Act (1862), 25 and 26 Vict., c. 89.

wind¹ (wind), n. [< ME. winde (= MD. MHG. winde, OHG. winda); from the verb.] A winding; a turn; a bend; as, the road there takes a wind to the south.—Out of wind, free from bends or crooks; perfectly straight. [Colloq.] wind² (wind); formerly and still poetically also wind, n. [< ME. wind, wynd, < AS. wind = OS. OFries. D. LG. wind = OHG. MHG. wint, G. wind = Icel. vindr = Sw. Dan. vind = Goth. winds, winthas, wind, air in motion, = W. gwynt

= L. ventus, wind, = Gr. áyrys, a blast, gale, wind, = Skt. vāta, wind; lit. 'that which blows,' being orig. from the ppr. (cf. Gr. áyēs (áfer-), blowing, ppr.) of a verb (Skt. √vā) seen in Goth. waian, etc., G. wehen, blow, Russ. vyatu, blow (> vyetrā, wind), etc., Lith. vėjas, wind, from which is also ult. derived weather; see weather. From the E. wind, besides the verb and the obvious derivatives or compounds, are derived window, winnow, etc.; from the L. are ult. E. vent², ventilate, ventose, etc. (see also vent¹).]

1. Air naturally in motion at the earth's surface with any degree of velocity; a current of air as coming from a particular direction. When the air has only a slight motion it is called a breeze; when its velocity is greater, a fresh breeze; and when it is violent, a gale, storm, or hurricane. The ultimate cause of winds is to be found in differences of atmospheric density produced by the sun in its unequal heating of different parts of the earth. These original differences of density give rise to vertical and horizontal currents of air which constitute and establish the general atmospheric circulation, and determine permanent belts of relatively high and low pressure over the earth's surface. Differences of pressure, in turn, produce their own differences of density at the earth's surface, and thereby become a secondary cause of winds. The general system of atmospheric circulation, with respect both to surface-winds and to their correlative upper currents, is described under trade-wind. In accordance with the character of their exciting cause, winds may be divided into—(1) constant, the trade winds and anti-trade winds, which depend upon the permanent difference of temperature between the equatorial regions and higher latitudes; (2) periodic, the monsoons, and land- and sea-breezes which arise respectively from a seasonal and diurnal difference of temperature between land and sea; (3) cyclonic and anticyclonic, winds associated with or constituting progressive areas of high and low pressure, the ultimate origin of which, especially of the high latitudes, is not satisfactorily determined; (4) whirlwinds and (certain) squalls, which arise when the air is in a condition of unstable equilibrium, and are developed as a part of the process by which stability is regained (this class includes the most violent winds, such as the tornado, and these occur when the instability is the combined effect of a high temperature and a high humidity, a condition favorable to the development of the greatest possible gradients of density, and hence of the most terrible manifestations of wind); (5) special, winds which logically belong to the preceding classes, but which by reason of special characteristics, arising frequently from local topography, have received special appellations, as the sirocco, the harimattan, the mistral, the foehn, the chinook, etc. Winds are also commonly named from the point of compass from which they blow, as a north wind, an east wind, a southwest wind. The winds were personified and worshiped as divinities by the ancients, and representations of them are frequent in ancient art, particularly in Greek sculpture and vase-painting.

And erly on the Tewysday, whiche was seynt Thomas daye, we made sayle, and passed by the costes of Slawony and Hystria with easy wynde.

Sir R. Guyfforde, Pilgrimage, p. 9.
By reason of contrary windes we put backe againe to Trodena, because we could not fetch Sapientia.
Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 168.

2. A direction from which the wind may blow; a point of the compass, especially one of the cardinal points. [Rare.]

Come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon these slain. Ezek. xxviii. 9.

3. Air artificially put in motion by any force or action; as, the wind of a bellows; the wind of a bullet or a cannon-ball (see windup).

Which he disdainng whisk'd his sword about,
And with the wind thereof the king fell down.
Marlowe and Nashe, Tragedy of Dido, ii. 1.
The whill and wind of his fell sword.
Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2. 495.

4. Air impregnated with animal odor or scent. Else counsellors will but take the wind of him. Bacon, Of Counsel.

5. In musical instruments the sound of which is produced by a stream of compressed air or breath, either the supply of air under compression, as in the bellows of an organ or in a singer's lungs, or the stream of air used in sound-production, as in the mouth of an organ-pipe, in the tube of a flageolet, or in the voice.

Their instruments were varions in their kind,
Some for the bow, and some for breathing wind.
Dryden, Flower and Leaf, l. 357.

6. Breath; also, power of respiration; lung-power. See second wind, below.

Ye move me sore in wasting all this wynde.
For I haue seide y-nogh, as semethe me.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 79.

My wynde is stopp'd, gon is my br the.
Cowdrey Mysteries, p. 226.
Woman, thy wordis and thy wynde thoum not waste.
York Plays, p. 258.

If my wind were but long enough to say my prayers, I would repent. Shak., M. W. of W., iv. 5. 104.

How they spar for wind, instead of hitting from the shoulder. O. W. Holmes, Professor, ii.

7. The part of the body in the region of the stomach, a blow upon which causes a temporary loss of respiratory power by paralyzing the diaphragm for a time. It forms a forbidden point of attack in scientific boxing. [Slang.]

He pats him and pokes him in divers parts of the body, but particularly in that part which the science of self-defence would call his wind. Dickens.

8. The wind-instruments of an orchestra taken collectively, including both the wood wind (flutes, oboes, etc.) and the brass wind (trumpets, horns, etc.).—9. Anything light as wind, and hence ineffective or empty; especially, idle words, threats, bombast, etc.

Nor think thou with wind
Of airy threats to awe. Milton, P. L., vi. 282

10. Air or gas generated in the stomach and bowels; flatulence.

Knowledge . . .
Oppresses else with surfeit, and soon turns Wisdom to folly, as nourishment to wind.
Milton, P. L., vii. 130.

11. A disease of sheep, in which the intestines are distended with air, or rather affected with a violent inflammation. It occurs immediately after shearing.—A capful of wind. See capful.—A fair wind, a wind that enables a sailing ship to head her course with the sails full. All in the wind. See all.—A sheet in the wind. See sheet.—Bare wind. See bare.—Before the wind. See before.—Between wind and water. (a) In that part of a ship's side or bottom which is frequently brought above the water by the rolling of the vessel or by fluctuation of the water's surface. Any breach effected by shot in this part is peculiarly dangerous.

They had a tall man-of-war to convey them; but, at the first bout, it was shot between wind and water, and forced to make towards land.

Court and Times of Charles I., II. 42.

Hence, figuratively.—(b) Any part or point generally where a blow or attack will most effectually injure.

Shot him between wind and water.

Beau, and El., Philaster, iv. 1.

He had hit his desires in the Master-vein, and struck his former Jealousie between wind and water, so that it sunk in the instant.

Fannant, Hist. of Edward II. (ed. 1680), p. 11.

Broken wind, a veterinary term for a form of paroxysmal dyspnea, which seems to depend on asthma combined with a varying amount of emphysema; also loosely used for other dyspneic conditions. See broken-winded and wind-broken.—By the wind. See by.—Cardinal winds. See cardinal.—Close to the wind. See close.—Down the wind. (a) In the direction of and moving with the wind: as, birds fly quickly down the wind. (b) Toward ruin, decay, or adversity. Compare to whistle off, under whistle, v. t.

The more he prayed to it [the image] to prosper him in the world, the more he went down the wind still.

Sir R. L'Estrange.

Head to wind. See head.—Hot winds of the plains, southwesterly winds in Texas, Kansas, Nebraska, and the Dakotas, which occur during the summer season, and by their extreme heat and dryness prove exceedingly destructive to vegetation.—How the wind blows or lies. (a) The direction or velocity of the wind. (b) Figuratively, the position or state of affairs; how matters stand at a particular juncture: as, trifles show how the wind blows.

Miss Sprong, her confidante, who, seeing how the wind lay, had tried to drop little malicious hints . . . until the old lady had cut them short. Farrar, Julian Home, iv.

In the wind, astr.; about.

Go to, there's somewhat in the wind, I see.

E. Jonson, Case is Altered, iii. 3.

What the blazes is in the wind now?

Dickens, Oliver Twist.

In the wind's eye, in the teeth of the wind, directly toward the point from which the wind blows; in a direction exactly contrary to that of the wind. Is the wind in that door? Is that how the case stands? Is that the state of affairs?

Phras. I am come to intreat you to stand my friend, and to favour me with a longer time, and I will make you sufficient consideration.

Course. Is the wind in that door? If that hast my money, so it is: I will not defer a day, an hour, a minute.

Green and Lodge, Looking-Glass for London and Eng.

Leading wind. See leading. Mountain and valley winds, m. m., diurnal winds blowing up the sides of mountains and the trough of valleys during the day, and down during the night. They are due to differences of temperature arising from unequal heating and radiation, whereby the air at the summits of hills and mountains is heated during the day to a higher temperature than the air at the same level over the valleys or lowlands, causing a current up the valleys and mountain-sides; conversely, during the night the air at the summit is cooled by radiation to a lower temperature than the air at the same level over the lowlands, causing a downward and surface flow of cold air. In narrow valleys this current sometimes attains great strength, as in the case of the Wisper wind of the Rhine. North wind of California, a dry, desiccating north wind experienced on the Pacific slope of the United States, and especially in the Sacramento and San Joaquin valleys of California. When occurring during the growing season, it is exceedingly injurious to vegetation.

On extra or heavy wind. See on, v. On the wind, as near as possible to the direction from which the wind blows. In the position or trimmed in the manner of a vessel that is sailing "by the wind." Periodic winds. See def. 1. Plate of wind. See plate. Red wind, a wind which blasts fruit or corn; a blight. Hallwell.

The goodliest trees in the garden are soonest blasted with red winds. Alp. Sandys, Sermons, p. 103. (Davies.)

Robin Hood wind, a wind in which the air is saturated with moisture at a temperature near the freezing-point, the moisture rendering it especially raw and penetrating; a thaw-wind. Running of the wind. See running.

Second wind, a regular state of respiration attained during continued exertion after the breathlessness which had arisen at an earlier stage. Slant of wind. See slant.—Soldier's wind. See soldier.—Thaw-wind, a wind prevailing during a thaw; in general, since it becomes saturated with moisture at a temperature only a little above freezing, it is peculiarly raw and penetrating.—To beat the wind. See beat.—To break wind, carry the wind, eat up into the wind, gain the wind. See the verbs.—To get one's wind, to recover one's breath; as, they will up and at it again when they get their wind. [Colloq.]—To get the wind of, to get on the windward side of.

All the three Diskainers made toward our ship, which was not careless to get the wind of them all.

Hakluyt's Voyages, III. 193.

To get (take) wind, to get wind of. See get.—To haul the wind. See haul.—To have a free wind. See free.—To have in the wind, to be on the scent or trail of; perceive and follow.

A hare had long escap'd pursuing hounds. . . .

To save his life, he leap'd into the main,
But there, alas! he could no safely find,
A pack of dog-fish had him in the wind. Swift.

To have the wind of. Same as to have in the wind.

My son and I will have the wind of you.

Shak., Tit. And., iv. 2. 133.

To keep the wind. See keep.—To near the wind, mean; stingy; cheese-paring. [Naut. slang.]—To raise the wind. See raise.—To recover the wind of. See recover.—To sail close to the wind. (a) To sail with the ship's head just so near to the wind as to fill the sails without shaking them; sail as closely against the direction of the wind as possible. (b) To border closely upon dishonesty or indecency: as, beware in dealing with him, he sails rather close to the wind. (c) See sail.—To shake a vessel in the wind. See shake.—To slip one's wind. See slip.—To sow the wind and reap the whirlwind, to act wrongly or recklessly and in time be visited with the evil effects of such conduct. Hos. viii. 7.—To take the wind out of one's sails. See sail.—To take wind, to leak out.—To touch the wind. See touch.—To whistle down the wind, to whistle for a wind. See whistle.—Wind-scale. See scale.—Syn. 1. Wind, Breeze, Gust, Flaw, Blast, Storm, Squall, Gale, Tempest, Hurricane, Tornado, Cyclone, etc. Wind is the general name for air in motion, at any rate of speed. A breeze is gentle and may be still; a gust is pretty strong, but especially sudden and brief; a flaw is essentially the same as gust, but may rise to the force of a squall; a blast is stronger and longer than a gust; a storm is a violent disturbance of the atmosphere, generally attended by rain, hail, or snow; a squall is a storm that begins suddenly and is soon over, perhaps consisting of a series of strong gusts; a gale is a violent and continued wind, lasting for hours or days, its strength being marked by such adjectives as stiff and hard; a tempest is the stage between a gale and a hurricane—hurricane being the name for the wind at its greatest height, which is such as to destroy buildings, uproot trees, etc. A tornado and a cyclone are by derivation storms in which the wind has a circular or rotatory movement (see def.).

wind² (wind), v. t.; pret. and pp. winded (in some uses, erroneously, wound), ppr. winding. [ME. winden, wynden (= MD. winden = OHG. wintōn), expose to the wind, air; < wind², n. With reference to blowing a horn, the verb wind², owing to the alternative (poetical) pron. wind, and prob. to some vague association of a horn as being usually curved, with the verb wind¹, has been confused with the verb wind¹, whence the irreg. pret. and pp. wound. It is possible, however, that the irreg. pret. and pp. wound arose out of mere conformity with the other verb, as the pret. rang, pp. rung (instead of ringed), of the verb ring², and the pret. wore, pp. worn, of the verb wear¹, arose out of conformity to similar forms of the similar verbs sing, swear, etc.] 1. To force wind through with the breath; blow; sound by blowing; as, to wind a horn: in this sense and the three following pronounced wind.

The last Miracle is the third time of Michaels winding his horn, when God shall bring forth all the Jewes.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 221.

Gawain . . . raised a bugle hazing from his neck,
And winded it, and that so musically
That all the old echoes hidden in the wall
Rang out like hollow woods at hunting-tide.

Tennyson, Pelleas and Ettarre.

2. To produce (sound) by blowing through or as through a wind-instrument.

But gin ye take that bugle-horn,

And wind a blast sue shrill.

Rose the Red, and White Lily (Child's Ballads, V. 178).

3. To announce, signal, or direct by the blast of a horn, etc. [Rare.]

'Twas pleasure, as we look'd behind,

To see how then the chase could sit wind,
Cheer the dark blood-hound on his way,
And with the bugle rouse the fray!

Scott, L. of I. M., v. 29.

4. To perceive or follow by the wind or scent; nose.

As when two skillful hounds the lev'ret wind,
Or chase thro' woods obscure the trembling hind:

Pope, Iliad, x. 427.

We winded them by our noses—their perfumes betrayed them.

Johnson, Dryden.

5. To expose to the wind; winnow; ventilate.—6. To drive or ride hard, as a horse, so as to render scant of wind.—7. To rest, as a horse, in order to let him recover wind.

windage (win'dāj), n. [< wind² + -age.] 1. In gun.: (a) The difference allowed between the diameter of a projectile and that of the bore of the gun from which it is to be fired, in order to allow the escape of some part of the explosive gas, and to prevent too great friction. (b) The rush or concussion of the air produced by the rapid passage of a shot.

The last shot flying so close to Captain Portar that with the windage of the bullet his very hands had almost lost the sense of feeling.

R. Pecke (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 626).

(c) The influence of the wind in deflecting a missile, as a ball or an arrow, from its direct path, or aside from the point or object at which it is aimed; also, the amount or extent of such deflection. (d) The play between the spindle of the De Bange gas-check and its cavity in the breech-screw: it is expressed in decimal parts of an inch, and is measured by the difference between the diameters of the spindle and its cavity.—2. In surg., same as wind-contusion. windas, windass (win'das), n. [Early mod. E. also windace, wyndace; < ME. windas, wyndas, windusse, a windlass, < MD. windas, D. windas (> OF. quindas, gupulas, F. quindas), windlass, lit. a 'winding-beam,' = Icel. rindass, a rounded pole which can be wound round, windlass, < D. winden = Icel. viñdu, wind (= E. wind), + ass = Icel. äss, pole, main rafter, sail-yard, = Goth. ans, a beam. Hence, by confusion with windlass, the modern form windlass.] 1. Same as windlass.

Ther may no man out of the place it dryve
For noon enyn of wyndas or polyve.

Chaucer, Squire's Tale, l. 176.

Gete some crosse bowis, and wyndas to bynd them with, and quarrels.

Paston Letters, I. 82.

2. A fauner for winnowing grain. Jamieson.

windbag (wind'bag), n. A bag filled with wind; hence, a person of mere words; a noisy, empty pretender. [Slang.]

windball (wind'bäl), n. 1. A ball inflated with air; a balloon.

Generally the high stile is disgraced and made foolish and ridiculous by all wordes affected, counterfeit, and puffed up, as it were a windball carrying more countenance then matter. Pattenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 165.

2. In surg., a cause of death or injury formerly supposed to lie in the passage of a projectile in close proximity to the person injured. See wind-contusion.

Where life is destroyed by the influence of the windball. J. M. Carnochan, Operative Surgery, p. 279.

wind-band (wind'band), n. 1. A company of musicians who use only or principally wind-instruments; a brass or military band.—2. The wind-instruments of an orchestra or band taken collectively. See wind², 8.—3. A long cloud supposed to indicate stormy weather. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

wind-beam (wind'bēm), n. A beam tying together the rafters of a pitched roof: same as collar-beam.

windberry (wind'ber'i), n.; pl. windberries (-iz). The cowberry, Vaccinium Vitis-Idæa. Britten and Holland. [Prov. Eng.]

wind-bill (wind'bily), n. In Scots law, an accommodation bill. See accommodation.

wind-bore (wind'bör), n. 1. The extremity of the suction-pipe of a pump, usually covered with a perforated plate to prevent the intrusion of foreign substances.—2. In mining, same as snore-piece.

windbound (wind'bound), a. Prevented from sailing by contrary winds; detained by contrary winds: as, windbound ships.

The next day we fasted, being windbound, and could not pass the sound.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 90.

wind-brace (wind'bräs), n. See brace.

wind-break (wind'bräk), n. Something to break the force of the wind, as a hedge, a board fence, or a row of evergreen trees; any shelter from the wind.

Under the lee of some shelving bank or other wind-break. T. Roosevelt, Hunting Trips, p. 176.

wind-break (wind'brāk), v. t. To break the wind of. See wind-braken.

"'Twould wind-break a mule to vie burdens with her."

Ford.

windbroacht (wind'brōch), n. The hurdy-gurdy or vielle.

Nero, a base blind fiddler, or player on that instrument which is called a windbroach.

Crashart, tr. of Rabelais, ii. 30.

For an old man to pretend to talk wisely is like a musician's endeavouring to fumble out a fine sonata upon a wind-brach. Tom Brown's Works, II. 234. (Darwin.)

wind-broken (wind'brōkn), p. a. Diseased in the respiratory organs; having the power of breathing impaired by chest-disease; as, a wind-broken horse. Also broken-winded.

wind-changing (wind'chān'jng), a. Change-ful as the wind; fickle. [Rare.]

Wind-changing Warwick now can change no more.

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., v. 1. 57.

wind-chart (wind'chärt), a. Chart showing the wind-directions at a given time, or the directions prevailing during any period of the year over any region of the earth. Wind-charts for the ocean, of which the "Wind and Current Charts" of the British Admiralty and the "Pilot Charts" of the United States Hydrographic Office are examples, constitute an important aid to navigators.

wind-chest (wind'chest), n. In organ-building, a chest or box immediately below the pipes or reeds, from which the compressed air is admitted to them by means of valves or pallets. See organ and reed-organ.

wind-colic (wind'kol ik), n. Intestinal pain caused by flatulence.

wind-contusion (wind'kōn-tū'zhon), n. In surgery, a contusion, such as rupture of the liver or concussion of the brain, unaccompanied by any external mark of violence, supposed to be produced by the air when rapidly displaced by the velocity of a projectile, as a cannon-ball. It is now, however, considered to be occasioned by the projectile itself striking the body in an oblique direction, the comparative escape of the external soft tissues being accounted for by the degree of obliquity with which the missile impinges on the elastic skin, together with the position of the internal structures injured relatively to the impingement of the ball on one side and hard resisting substances on another. Also called windane.

wind-cutter (wind'kut'ēr), n. In organ-building, the upper lip of the mouth of a flue-pipe, against which the stream of air impinges when the pipe is sounded.

wind-dial (wind'di'al), n. A dial showing the changes in the direction of the wind by means of an index or pointer connected with a wind-vane.

The Wind Dial lately set up at Grigsby's Coffee and Chocolate House, behind the Royal Exchange, being the first and only one in any publick House in England, and having given great Satisfaction to all that have seen it, and being of Constant use to those that are in any wise Concerned in Navigation.

Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, [II. 56.]

wind-dog (wind'dog), n. A name popularly applied to fragments of rainbows seen on detached clouds. Also wind-gall.

wind-dropsy (wind'drop'si), n. Emphysema; tympanites.

wind-egg (wind'eg), n. An infecund or otherwise imperfect egg, as one which will produce nothing but wind (gas); a soft-shelled egg, such as may be laid by a hen that is comparatively old or has been injured.

winder¹ (win'dēr), n. [*< wind*¹ + *-er*¹.] 1. One who winds, rolls, or coils: as, a bobbin-winder.

They consist of sewing boys, shoe-binders, winders for weavers, and girls for all kinds of jing needlework.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, II. 353.

2. An instrument or a machine for winding thread, etc. (a) A contrivance like a small windlass revolving a spool or reel upon which the thread is wound. (b) A large adjustable frame which can be passed through the opening of a skein and then increased in diameter so as to hold it firmly for winding off. (c) A small stick, strip, or notched slate upon which thread can be wound: a substitute for a spool or reel.

3. The key or utensil used to wind up the spring-work of a roasting-jack.

To keep troublesome servants out of the kitchen, always leave the winder sticking on the jack to fall on their heads.

Swift, Advice to Servants (Cook).

4. A plant that twists itself round others.

Winders and creepers; as ivy, briony, hops.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 536.

5. A winding-step of a staircase.

winder² (win'dēr), n. [*< wind*² + *-er*¹.] 1. One who winds or sounds a horn.

Winder of the horn,

When snouted wild-boars routing tender corn Anger our huntsman. Keats, Endymion, l.

2 (win'dēr). A blow which takes away the breath.—3. A fan. Hallucell. [Prov. Eng.] winder² (win'dēr), v. t. [*< winder*², n.; prob. in part a dial. corruption of winner for winnor.] To fan; clean or winnow with a fan; as, to winder grain. Rockett. [Prov. Eng.] windfall (wind'fāl), n. [*< wind*¹ + *fall*¹, v.] 1. Something blown down by the wind, as fruit from a tree, or a number of trees in a forest.

When they did spread, and their boughs were become too great for their stem, they became a windfall upon the sudden.

Bacon, True Greatness of Kingdoms and Estates (ed. 1887).

She's nobbut gone int' t' orchard, to see if she can find wind-falls enough for t' make a pie or two for t' lads.

Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, vi.

2. An unexpected piece of good fortune, as an unexpected legacy.

This man, who otherwise beforetime was but poor and needy, by these windfalls and unexpected cheats became very wealthy. Holland, tr. of Plutarch's Morals, p. 1237.

3. The tract of fallen trees, etc., which shows the path of a tornado.—4. A violent gust of wind rushing from coast-ranges and mountains to the sea.—5. The down-rush of air occurring on the leeward side of a hill or mountain at a distance from its base.

windfall¹ (wind'fāl), a. Windfallen. [Rare.]

You shall have leaves and windfall boughs enow,
Near to these woods, to roast your meat withal.

Marlowe and Nashe, Dido, Queen of Carthage, i. 1. 172.

windfallen (wind'fā'ln), a. Blown down by the wind.

To gather windfall'n sticks.

Drayton, Polyolbion, xiii. 152.

windfanner (wind'fan'ēr), n. Same as wind-horer.

wind-fertilized (wind'fēr'ti-lizd), a. In bot., fertilized with pollen borne by the wind, as flowers; anemophilous, as conifers, grasses, sedges, etc.

windfish (wind'fish), n. The fall-fish, or silver chub, Semotilus bullaris, the largest cyprinoid of eastern North America. See Semotilus.

wind-flower (wind'flon'ēr), n. 1. A plant of the genus Anemone, chiefly the wood-anemone, A. nemorosa: so called by translation of the classic name of an anemone or other plant anciently associated with the wind. The wind-loving reputation of this plant appears to have been conferred chiefly by the name. The wind-flower is a small herb, found in Europe, northwestern Asia, and North America, bearing a whorl of three trifoliate leaves and a single delicate white or outwardly pinkish vernal flower. The American pasque-flower, A. patens, var. Nuttalliana, bears the name specifically in the western United States.

Bide thou where the poppy blows,
With wind-flowers trail and fair.

Bryant, Arctic Lover.

2. The marsh-gentian, Gentiana Pacumontanther, Tras. of Bol.

wind-furnace (wind'fēr'nās), n. Any form of furnace using the natural draft of a chimney without the aid of a bellows or blower; a natural-draft furnace; a laboratory-furnace provided with a tall chimney.

The crucible is then placed in a wind-furnace, and slowly heated as long as fumes escape. Ure, Dict., IV. 553.

wind-gage (wind'gāj), n. 1. An instrument for ascertaining the velocity and force of wind; an anemometer. See anemometer.—2. An apparatus or contrivance for measuring or indicating the amount of the pressure of the wind in the wind-chest of an organ.—3. Milt., a graduated attachment to the sights of a firearm or cannon by which allowance can be made, in aiming, for the effect of the wind upon the projectile.

wind-gall¹ (wind'gāl), n. [*< wind*² + *gall*².] Distention of the synovial bursa at the fetlock-joint of the horse, such as may be felt on each side of the tendons behind the joint. Also called puff.

His horse, . . . full of windgalls, sped with spavins.

Shak., T. of the 8, iii. 2. 53.

Neither Spavin, Splinter, nor Wind-gal!

Etherage, She Would If She Could, ii. 2.

wind-gall² (wind'gāl), n. [*< wind*² + *gall*²; as in water-gall, weather-gall.] Same as wind-dog.

"Wind-dogs," . . . fragments or pieces (as it were) of rainbows (sometimes called wind-galls) seen on detached clouds.

Fitz Roy, Weather Book, p. 23.

wind-galled (wind'gāld), a. Having wind-galls.

Did you think I was Wind-gall'd? I can sing too, if I please.

Steele, Tender Husband, iii. 1.

wind-gap (wind'gap), n. See gap, 2.

wind-gun (wind'gun), n. Same as air-gun.

For'd from wind-guns, lead itself can fly,

And pond'rous slugs cut swiftly through the sky.

Pope, Dunciad, l. 181.

wind-hatch (wind'hach), n. In mining, the opening or place where ore is taken out of the earth.

windhawk (wind'hāk), n. The windhover or kestrel.

wind-herb (wind'ērē), n. See Phlomis.

wind-house (wind'hous), n. A house built partly underground to serve as a shelter or place of refuge in hurricanes.

windhover (wind'huv'ēr), n. A kind of hawk, the kestrel, Falco tinnunculus or Tinnunculus alaudarius: so called from its hovering in the face of the wind. See kestrel. Also called windhubber, windenffer, windfuener, windhawk, windsucker, vanner-hawk, standel, etc.

About as long
As the wind-hover hangs in balance.

Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

windily (win'di-li), adv. With high wind; in a way that betokens wind.

The stars were glittering windily even before this crimson melted out of the east.

W. C. Russell, Sailor's Sweetheart, iv.

windiness (win'di-nēs), n. 1. The state of being windy or tempestuous; as, the windiness of the weather or season.—2. Flatulence.—3. Tendency to generate wind (gas); as, the windiness of vegetables.—4. Tumor; puffiness; vanity; boastfulness.

The swelling windiness of much knowledge.

Breerwood's Languages, Pref.

winding¹ (win'ding), p. a. [*Prov. of wind*¹, v.]

1. Curving; spiral: as, a winding stair.

The stairs are winding, having a stately rocade.

Coryat, Crudities, l. 35.

2. Full of bends or turns: as, a winding path.

The ascent [of mount Tabor] is so easy that we rode up the north side by a winding road.

Poecke, Description of the East, II. i. 64.

Across the court-yard, into the dark
Of the winding pathway in the park,
Curate and lantern disappear.

Longfellow, Baron of St. Castine.

3. Warped; twisted; bent; crooked: as, a winding surface.

winding¹ (win'ding), n. [< ME. wryndynge; verbal n. of *wind*¹, v.] 1. A turn or turning; a bend; flexure; meander: as, the windings of a road or stream.

The degise, endentyng, barrynge, owindynge, palyng, wyndynge or bendynge, and semblable wast of chodh in vanitee.

Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

They [the ways] were wonderful hard, all stony and full of windings.

Coryat, Crudities, l. 92.

To follow the windings of this river.

Addison, Remarks on Italy (Works, ed. Bohn, I. 537).

The windings of the marge. Tennyson, Edwin Morris.

2. A twist in any surface, so that all its parts do not lie in the same plane; a casting or warping. Griff.—Compound winding. When the field-magnets of a dynamo are fitted with two coils, one of which is placed in circuit with the armature and external leads, while the other is connected across the terminals as a shunt, the dynamo is said to be compound wound, and the winding compound winding.

Differential winding. See differential.—In winding, warped; out of the straight: applied by joiners to a piece of wood when two of its opposite corners stand higher than the other two.—Out of winding, brought to a plane; said of a surface: a workmen's phrase.—Series winding. A dynamo is said to be series wound, or to have a series winding, when its field-magnet coil is joined in series with the armature coil.—Shunt winding. When the field-magnet coils of a dynamo are designed for, and connected as, a shunt on the armature coil, the dynamo is said to be shunt wound, and the method of winding shunt winding.

winding² (win'ding), n. [Verbal n. of *wind*², v.] A call by the boatswain's whistle.

winding-engine (win'ding-en-jin), n. Any steam-motor employed to turn a drum around which a hoisting-rope is drawn; in a mine, an engine by which the ropes are wound on and unwound from the drums, for raising or lowering the bucket, kibble, or cage on which the mined material is brought to the surface.

Also called drawing-engine and hoisting-engine.

windingly (win'ding-li), adv. In a winding manner; with curves, bends, or turns.

The stream that creeps Windingly by it. Keats, Endymion, i.

winding-pondant (win'ding-pen-dant), n. Naut., a pendant hooked at the fore- or main-masthead with its hight secured as far out as necessary on the foreyard or main-yard, and having a heavy tackle, called a winding-tackle, depending from its lower end, used for lifting heavy weights.

winding-rope (win'ding-rōp), n. In mining, the rope which connects the cage with the drum of the winding-engine. Formerly the winding-ropea wire of hemp or manila; at the present time steel wire is chiefly used, and both flat and round ropes are employed. In one of the largest Belgian coal-mines, in which the lift is 700 yards, the rope (which tapers toward the bottom) weighs 4 tons.

winding-sheet (win'ding-shēt), n. 1. A sheet in which a corpse is wrapped.

These arms of mine shall be thy winding sheet;

My heart, sweet boy, shall be thy sepulchre.

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., ii. 5. 114.

2. Solidified drippings of grease from a candle which cling to the side of it and present some resemblance to drapery in its folds and creases. The appearance of this has been fancied to be an omen of death or other misfortune.

He . . . fell asleep on his arms, . . . a long winding-sheet in the candle dripping down upon him.

Dickens, Tale of Two Cities, ii. 4.

winding-stairs (win'ding-stärz), n. A ladder-shell; a scalaria; a wentletrap. See cut under Scalariat.

The Dutch call these shells winding-stairs.

P. P. Carpenter, Lect. Mollusca, 1861.

winding-sticks (win'ding-stiks), n. pl. In joinery, two short sticks or strips of wood with parallel edges, placed across the two ends of a board to test its freedom from warps or winds.

winding-tackle (win'ding-tak'l), n. A heavy tackle for use with a winding-pendant.

winding-up (win'ding-up'), n. The act of one who winds up, in any sense.

It is curious that in the winding-up of each of these pieces the same expedient is employed.

Gifford, Int. to Ford's Plays, p. xli.

wind-instrument (wind'in'strō-ment), n. A musical instrument the sound of which is produced by a stream of compressed air, usually by the breath. Chief of such instruments is the human voice. Wind instruments blown by the breath are divided into two classes: wood wind-instruments, including the flute, flageolet, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, English horn, etc.; and brass or metal wind-instruments, including the trumpet, horn, trombone, tuba, euphonium, etc. Wind-instruments sounded by air mechanically compressed include the pipe-organ and the reed-organ, together with the bagpipe, and, in a certain sense, the Eolian harp. The method of tone-production in all these instruments, except the last, is either the vibration induced in a stream of air by directing it against a sharp edge, as in the flute and in the pipes in the organ, or the vibration induced in an elastic tongue or reed in or over an orifice through which a stream of air is driven, as in the voice, the clarinet, and the reed-organ. Sometimes both methods are used in the same instrument, as in the pipe-organ.

With a wind instrument my master made,
In five days you may breathe ten languages,
As perfect as the devil or himself.

T. Tomkis (?), Albmazar, i. 3.

windlacet, n. Same as *windlass*¹.

windlass¹ (wind'las), n. [Early mod. E. also windlase, windlase, windlase, windlase; perhaps < ME. windels (= MLG. windelse, a winding, hurdle-work, LG. windels, a winding, as the winding of a screw, or the ornamental work on a sword-hilt), < AS. windlan, etc., turn, wind; see *wind*¹, and cf. windle.] 1. A winding or turning; a circuitous course; a circuit.

Hewar that fetteth the windlase in hunting. Chaucer.

Palsgrave, p. 231.

Amongst theis be appointed a few horsmen to range some what abroad for the greater appearance, bidding them fetch a windlase a great way about, and to make al toward one place.

Golding, tr. of Cesar, fol. 206.

I now fetching a windlase, that I might better haue a shoute.

Lyly, Euphues and his England, p. 270.

Hence—2. Any indirect, artful course; circumvention; art and contrivance; subtleties.

Thus do we of wisdom and of reach,
With windlasses and with assays of bias,
By inductions find directions out.

Shak., Hamlet, ii. 1. 65.

windlass² (wind'las), v. [Early mod. E. also windlase, windlase, windlase, windlase; n.] I. intrans. 1. To take a circuitous path; fetch a compass.

A skilful wood-monger by windlasing presently gets a shoot which without taking a compass . . . he could never have obtained.

Hammond, Works, IV. 615. (Latham.)

2. To adopt a circuitous, artful, or cunning course; use stratagem; act indirectly or warily.

She is not so much at leisure as to windlase, or use craft, to satisfy them.

Hammond, Works, IV. 596. (Latham.)

II. trans. To bend; turn about; bewilder.

Your words, my friend (right heartily caustic!) blame My young mind mired, whom love doth windlass so.

Sir P. Sidney, Viceroy's Eng. Canon, I. 513.

windlass² (wind'las), n. [Early mod. E. also windlase; a corruption of windlas, windlass, by confusion with *windlass*¹.] 1. A modification of the wheel and axle, used for raising weights, etc. One kind of windlass is the winch used for raising water from wells, etc., which has an axle turned by a crank, and a rope or chain for raising the weight by being wound round the axle. A simple form of windlass, much used in ships for raising the anchors or obtaining a purchase on other occasions, consists of a strong beam of wood placed horizontally, and supported at its ends by iron spindles which turn in collars or bushes inserted in what are termed the windlass-bits. This large axle is pierced with holes directed toward its center, in which long levers or handspikes are inserted for turning it round when the anchor is to be weighed or any purchase is required. It is furnished with pawls to prevent it from turning backward when the pressure on the handspikes is intermitted. Different arrangements of gearing are applied to a windlass to exert increased power, and steam-windlasses, in which a small steam-engine is made to heave the windlass round, have come largely into use. Compare cupstan (with cut), and cut under winch.

Windlass.

a, a, ratchet-heads; b, b, drum-heads; c, c, whelps built round a spindle which is journaled in the cheeks d, d. The pawls are pivoted in the pawl-bits e, e, and sustain the strain while the handspikes, which rotate the windlass by being placed like spokes in the holes of the drum-heads, are being shifted for a new purchase.

24. A handle by which anything is turned; specifically, a winch-like contrivance for bending the arbalest or crossbow. See crossbow.

The arbalest was a cross-bow, the windlass the machine used in bending that weapon. Scott, Ivanhoe, xxviii., note.

Differential or Chinese windlass, a windlass with a barrel differing in diameter in different parts, the rope winding upon the larger and unwinding from the smaller portion. The amount of absolute lift and of the power exerted is determined by the difference in the two diameters of the barrel.—Spanish windlass (caut.), an extemporized purchase made by winding a rope round a roller and inserting a lever in a hitch or bight of the rope. By heaving round the lever a considerable strain is produced.

windlass² (wind'las), v. [*windlass*², n.] I. intrans. To use a windlass; raise something as by a windlass.

Let her [Truth] rest, my dear sir, at the bottom of her well; . . . none of our windlassing will ever bring her up.

Miss Edgeworth, Helen, xiv.

II. trans. To hoist or haul by means of a windlass.

The stern line began to draw, and the sloop was windlassed clear of the stone pile and saved.

The Century, XXXIX. 226.

windle (win'dl), n. [windle, as in comp. zarn-windel, a wheel on which yarn is wound, < AS. windel (= MD. windel, a wheel, pulley, roll, cradle, = MLG. windle, a roll, etc.), < windan, etc., turn, wind; see *wind*¹, and cf. *windlass*¹.] 1. An implement or engine for turning or winding; used in different senses locally.

To force the water . . . with devise of engines and windles up to the top of the hill.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxxvi. 15.

Speak her fair and canny, or we will have a ravelled hasp on the yarn-windles.

Scott, Pirate, v.

From a windle the thread is conducted to the quills.

S. Judd, Margaret, i. 2.

2. The windthrush or redwing, Turdus iliacus. See cut 2 under *thrush*¹. [Devonshire, Eng.]

—3. A dry measure, equal to about 3½ Winchester bushels. The official returns for 1879 showed that it was not then entirely obsolete. It is there stated as 220/58 imperial bushels of wheat, 180/50 bushels of barley, or 220/62-857 bushels of beans.

so windels of barley . . . £40.

H. Hall, Society in Elizabethan Age, App. 1.

windlest, n. An obsolete form of *windlass*². Colgrave.

windless (wind'les), a. [*wind*² + -less.] 1. Free from or unaffected by wind; calm; unruffled.

A windless sea under the moon of midnight. Ruskin.

A windless, cloudless even. William Morris, Sigurd, iii.

2. Wanting wind; out of breath.

Binding his hands and knitting a handkercher about his eyes, that he should not see, and when they had made him sure and fast, then they laid him on until they were windless.

Herman, Caveat for Cursetors, p. 96.

windleset, n. An obsolete form of *windlass*¹.

windlestraw (win'dl-strā), n. [Also Se. windlestraw; < AS. windlestreow, straw for plaiting, < windel, a woven basket, etc., + straw, etc., straw; see windle and *straw*¹.] 1. The old stalk of various grasses, as the tufted hair-grass, Deschampsia (Ara) cespitosa, the dog's-tail, Cynosurus cristatus, or Apera (Aproslis) Spica-venti.

Tall spires of windlestraw

Threw their thin shadows down the rugged slope.

Shelley, Alastor.

2. The whitethroat, Sylvia cinerea; same as jackstraw, 5. [Local, Eng.] windlift (wind'lift), n. [A perversion of windlass, windlesse, the second element being made to simulate *lift*².] A windlass.

A Wind-lift to heave up a gross Scandal.

Roger North, Examen, p. 354.

windling (wind'ling), n. [*wind*² + *-ling*¹.] A branch blown down by the wind. [Prov. Eng.] wind-marker (wind'inār'kēr), n. A movable arrow or other device for showing on a chart the direction of the wind at any point.

windmill (wind'mil), n. [ME. windmille, windmelle, windmille, windmille, windmille = D. windmolen = MHG. wintmül, G. windmühle; < *wind*² + müll, n.]

1. A mill or machine for grinding, pumping, or other purposes, moved by the wind; a wind-motor; any form of motor for utilizing the pressure of the wind as a motive power. Two types of machines are used, the horizontal and the vertical. The vertical motor consists essentially of a horizontal shaft called the wind-shaft, with a combination of sails or vanes fixed at the end of the shaft, and suitable gearing for conveying the motion of the wind-shaft to the pump or other machinery. The older types of windmill used four vanes or sail-frames called whips, covered with canvas, arrangements being provided for reefing the sails in high winds. To present the vanes to the wind, the whole structure or tower carrying the windmill was at first turned round by means of a long lever. Later the top of the tower, called the cap, was made movable. Windmills are now made with many wooden vanes forming a disk exposed to the winds, and fitted with automatic feathering and steering machinery, governors for regulating the speed, apparatus for closing the vanes in storms, etc. These improved windmills are chiefly of American invention, and are largely used in all parts of windolett, n. A false spelling of windowlet.

windore (win'dor), n. [A perversion of window, simulating door.] A window.

Nature has made man's breast no windores,

To publish what he does within doors.

S. Butler, Hudibras, II. ii. 369.

window (win'dō), n. [Early mod. E. window; < ME. windoure, wyndoure, windoge, windowe (the orig. guttural showing in the Sc. windak, windock, winnock), < feel. windauga (= Norw. vindauga = Dan. vindue for vindøje*, the form vindue being prob. < feel.), window, lit. 'wind-eye,' < vindr, wind, + auga, eye; see *wind*² and *eye*¹, n. The AS. words were ægdura, 'eyedoor,' and æghthyl, 'eyethirl,' i. e. 'eyehole.' The G. word for window is fenster = Sw. fönster, from the L.] 1. An opening in the wall of a building for the admission of light and air. In modern buildings this opening is usually fitted with a frame in which are set movable sashes containing panes of glass or other transparent material, the whole frame with the sashes, etc., also being known as the window. Many windows are not designed to be opened. Glass was employed in windows among the ancient Romans, and came into extensive use among other nations in the course of the eleventh century. See cuts under bateman-light, multifoil, rose-window, and wheel-window.

wine (win), n. [< ME. win, wyn, < AS. win = OS. OFries. win = D. wijn = MLG. win = LG. wien = OHG. MHG. win, G. wein, wine, = Icel. vin = Sw. Dan, vin = Goth. wein = Lt. Sp. vin = Pg. vinho = F. vin = Slav. OBulg. Serv. vin = Bohem. vin = Pol. win = Russ. vin = OIr. fín, Ir. Gael. fion, < L. vinum, wine, collectively grapes, = Gr. oivov, wine, allied to oiv, the vine; cf. L. ritis, the vine, vinea, vine, etc. From the L. vinum are also ult. E. vine, vignette, vinous, vinegar, vintage, vineyard, etc.] 1. The fermented juice of the grape or fruit of the vine, Vitis. See Vitis. Wines are distinguished practically by their color, their hardness or softness on the palate, their flavor, and their being still or effervescing. The differences in the quality of wines depend upon differences in the varieties of vine, and quite as much on the differences of the soils in which the vines are planted, in the exposure of the vineyards, in the treatment of the grapes, and in the mode of manufacturing the wines. When the grapes are just fully ripe, the wine is generally most perfect as regards strength and flavor. The leading character of wine, however, must be referred to the alcohol which it contains, and upon which its intoxicating powers principally depend. The amount of alcohol in the stronger ports and sherries as found in the market is from 16 to 25 per cent., in hock, claret, and other light wines, from 7 per cent. Wine containing more than 13 per cent. of alcohol may be assumed to be fortified with brandy or other spirit. Among the most celebrated ancient wines were those of Lesbos and Chios of the Greeks, and the Falernian and Cereban of the Romans. Among the principal modern wines are port, sherry, Bordeaux, Burgundy, champagne, Madeira, Rhine, Moselle, Tokay, and Marsala. The principal wine-producing countries are France, Germany, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Austria-Hungary, Greece, Cape Colony, Australia, and the United States.

That moon much merke on me make,

For win in his bed that wende.

Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 900.

He [God] causeth the grass to grow for the cattle, and herb for the service of man; that he may bring forth food out of the earth, and wine that maketh glad the heart of man.

Is. civ. 14, 15.

Bacchus, that first from out the purple grape crushed the sweet poison of misused wine.

Milton, Comus, l. 47.

2. The juice, fermented or unfermented, of certain fruits or plants, prepared in imitation of wine obtained from grapes: as, gooseberry wine; raspberry wine.

Perhaps you'd like to spend a couple of shillings, or so, in a bottle of currant wine by and by?

Dickens, David Copperfield, vi.

3. Figuratively, intoxication produced by the use of wine.

wine-measure (win'mezh'ür), n. An old English system of measures of capacity differing from beer-measure, the gallon being about five sixths of the gallon of the latter, and containing only 231 cubic inches. It remained in use until the establishment of the Imperial gallon in 1825, and its gallon is the standard of the United States. In wine-measure, 1 tun = 2 pipes = 3 pumcheons = 4 hogsheads = 6 tierces; one tierce = 42 gallons; one gallon = 2 pottles = 4 quarts = 8 pints. See also gill and gallon.

wine-merchant (win'mēr'chant), n. One who deals in wines and other alcoholic beverages, especially at wholesale, or in large quantities.

wine-oil (win'oil), n. The commercial name for an oil found in a peculiarly rich brandy made from the ferment and stalks left from wine-making. It has a strong flavor of cognac. Also called enque-oil and huile de marc.

wine-palm (win'pām), n. A palm from which palm-wine is obtained; a toddy-palm. See toddy and toddy-palm. Compare buriti.

wine-party (win'pär'ti), n. A party at which wine is a chief feature; a drinking-party.

There were young men who despised the lads who indulged in the coarse hospitalities of wine-parties, who prided themselves in giving rechereché little French dinners.

Thackeray, Book of Snobs, xv.

wine-piercer (win'pēr'sēr), n. In her., a bearing representing an instrument for tapping casks. It somewhat resembles a gimlet with a heavy handle set crosswise to the shaft.

wine-press (win'pres), n. A press in which the juice is squeezed from grapes.

I have caused wine to fail from the wine-presses; none shall tread with shouting.

Jer. xlviii. 33.

wine-room (win'röm), n. 1. A room in which wine is kept or stored.—2. A room where wine is served to customers; a bar-room.

winery (win'ner-i), n.; pl. wineries (-iz). [< win + -ery.] A establishment for making wine.

Several large canneries have been established within ten years, as well as packing establishments for raisins, and wineries.
Appleton's Ann. Cyc., 1886, p. 186.

wine-sap (win'sap), n. A highly esteemed American apple.

wine-skin (win'skin), n. A vessel for holding wine, made of the nearly complete skin of a goat, hog, or other quadruped, with the openings of the legs, neck, etc., secured. Compare borachio, askos.

No man putteth new wine into old wine-skins; . . . but they put new wine into fresh wine-skins.

Mark ii. 22 [R. V.].

wine-sopst (win'sops), n. pl. Same as sops in wine. See sop.

Bring the Finches therewith many Gelliflowres sweete, And the Cullamblynes; let us have the Wynesops.
E. Webbe, Eng. Poetrie (ed. Arber), p. 84.

wine-sour (win'sour), n. A kind of plum. Halliwel.

wine-stone (win'stön), n. A deposit of crude tartar or argol which settles on the sides and bottoms of wine-casks.

wine-taster (win'täs'tör), n. 1. One whose business it is to taste or sample wines.—2. Same as sampling-tube. Compare pipette.

wine-tree (win'trē), n. [< ME. wintre; < AS. wintrow; a grape-vine, < win, wine, + treow, tree; see winr and tre.] A grape-vine.

Me drempte, ic stod at a wine-tree,

That adde waxen huges thre,

Orest it blomed, and sithen bar

The berries ripe, wuth ic war.

Genesis and Exodus (E. E. T. S.), 1. 2059.

wine-vault (win'vält), n. 1. A vaulted wine-cellar; hence, any wine-cellar, or place for the storage of wines.—2. Generally in the plural, a place where wine is tasted or drunk; often used as equivalent to tavern or "saloon."

wine-warrant (win'wor'ant), n. A warrant to the keeper of a bonded warehouse for the delivery of wine.

winey, a. See winy.

wineyard, n. [< ME. wynyard, winyard, wine-gard; < AS. winegard, a vineyard, < win, wine,

+ gard, yard; see wine and yard.] (1. vine-gard.) Same as vineyard.

Smith & Keetheth us, loofman, anon the jange noxes. That both the crest prokages that strieth the wine-coules.
Ancient Rials, p. 234.

wing (winge), n. [Formerly also wing; < ME. winge, winge, also (with intrusive k) hwinge, whinge, < level, vange = Sw. Dan. vinge, a wing. The AS. word for 'wing' was fíther; cf. L. pennis, Gr. πτερον, wing, from the same ult. source; see feather and pin.] 1. In vertebrate zool., the fore limb, anterior extremity, or appendage of the scapular arch or shoulder-girdle, corresponding to the human arm, fitted in any way for flight or aerial locomotion; or the same limb, however rudimentary or functionless, of a member of a class of animals which ordinarily have this limb fitted for flight. That modification of a limb which makes it a wing occurs in several ways: (a) In ornith., by the reduction and consolidation of terminal bones of the fore limb, the reduction of the free carpal bones to two, a peculiar construction and mechanism of the joints, a compaction of the fleshy parts, and an extension of surface by the peculiar tegumentary outgrowths called feathers. (See cuts under felthymus and pinion.) Such a limb, in nearly all birds, is serviceable for aerial flight; in a few birds, as dippers, which fly through the air, also for swimming under water; in some, as penguins, only for swimming, in which case the wing is flipper-like or fin-like; in some, as the ostrich, it serves only as an aid in running; in some, as the emu, cassowary, and apteryx, it is practically functionless; it appears to have been wanting in the moas; it is a weapon of offense and defense in some birds, as the swan, and others in which it is provided with a horny spur; it is terminated with a claw or claws in some birds. The principal feathers of the wing are the remiges, rowers, or flight-feathers, those which are seated upon the hand being the primaries, those of the forearm secondaries, those of the upper arm tertiaries and scapulars, those of the thumb bastard quills; the smaller feathers, overlying the bases of the remiges, are collectively known as coverts. (See cut under covert, 6.) The various shapes of birds' wings depend to some extent upon the proportions of the bones, especially those of the pinion (see Macrocercus), but mainly upon the development of the flight-feathers, and the lengths of these relatively to one another. Among birds which can fly probably no one shape is sharply distinguished from all others; so that the terms in technical use are simply descriptive of size, contour, and the like, as long, short, narrow, broad (or ample), pointed, rounded, vaulted, etc., requiring no further explanation. See names of the sets of feathers used above, and phrases below. (b) In mammal., by the enormous extension of bones of the hand and fingers, upon which, and between which and the body and leg, is stretched an extension of integument, the whole limb being lengthened, as well as its terminal segment, and there being other peculiarities of osseous structure and mechanism, as the apparent absence of one of the two bones of the forearm Wing of bird: feathers of the wing trap pterygia along: 1, bend of the wing, or carpal angle; 2, edge of the wing; 3, wing-tip, at end of longest primary; 4, 5, the pinion, borne upon the manus, consisting of ten primaries and the primary coverts, together with the alula, or bastard wing; 6, the inner edge of the wing in the middle of the posterior border of wing 2; 4, 1-3, 4, seven secondaries, over hand by greater, median, and lesser rows of secondary coverts, the unshaded area forming a speculum; 4, 5, three tertiary, or coverts, inner secondaries; 6, root of the wing, toward the anatomical shoulder; 6, 1, anterior border of the wing.

by extreme reduction of the ulna. Such is the condition of the fore limb of bats, or Chiroptera, which alone are provided with true wings and capable of true flight; for the so-called wings of various other mammals described as "flying," as the flying-squirrel, flying-phalanger, etc., are more properly parachutes or patagia, and their flight is only a prolonged leap. See cuts under bat, flying-fox, and Pteropodidae. (c) In herpet., by a modification of the fore limb comparable to that of a bat's, but peculiar in the enormous extension of an ulnar digit, and its connection with other digits and with the body by an expansion of the integument, as in the extinct flying reptiles, the pteroactyls. (See cut under pteroactyl.) The flying apparatus of certain recent reptiles, as the Draco volans, is a parachute, not a true wing. (d) In icht., a mere enlargement of the pectoral fins enables some fishes to sustain a kind of flight; and, as the pectoral fins answer to the fore limbs of higher vertebrates, this case comes under the definition of a wing. See cut under flycatcher.

Wing of bat: expansion of skin from the body on to elongated digits. a, shoulder; b, elbow; c, wrist; d, hind foot; 1, small free hooked thumb; 2, 3, second and third fingers, lying close together; 4, fourth finger; 5, fifth finger.

2. In entom., an expansion of the crust of an insect, sufficing for flight, or a homologous expansion, however modified in form or function, or even functionless so far as aerial locomotion is concerned. Such a formation, though a wing by analogy of function with the wing of a vertebrate, is an entirely different structure, having no homology with the fore limb of a vertebrate. It consists of a fold of integument, supported on a tubular framework of so-called nerves or veins, which may be in communication with the tracheae or breathing-organs, and is consequently a respiratory as well as a locomotory organ. Most insects are provided with functionally developed (thoracic) wings, of which there are usually two pairs: one thoracic and one abdominal; but both may be entirely suppressed, or either pair may be more rudimentary—see cuts under halter; and stigma, of the anterior pair may be converted into a heavy case covering the other pair, as in the great order Coleoptera, where the anterior pair are converted into elytra, and in Diptera, in which they become hymen. (See apterous.) The form, structure, and disposition of insects' wings are very variable, but quite constant in large groups, and therefore a basis of the division of insects into orders, and of their classification; whence the terms Coleoptera, Neuroptera, Lepidoptera, Orthoptera, Diptera, Aptera, etc. See phrases below, and cuts under nerve and vein.

Wing of Butterfly: 1, front, costal, or cephalic margin; 2, apex or tip; 3, outer, distal, or apical margin; 4, inner, basal angle; 5, 4. inner, posterior, or anal margin; 6, 3. base. Several nerves or veins appear, separating wing cells.

3. In other invertebrates, some part resembling or likened to a wing in form or function; an alate formation, as the expanded lip of a strombus.—4. An organ resembling the wing of a bird, bat, or insect, with which gods, angels, demons, dragons, and a great variety of fabulous beings, as well as some inanimate objects, are conceived to be provided for the purpose of aerial locomotion or as symbolical of the power of omnipresence.

As far as Boreas claps his brazen wings.

Marlowe, Tamburlaine, I, i. 2.

O, welcome, pure-eyed Faith; white-handed Hope, Thou hovering angel, girl with golden wings.

Milton, Comus, l. 214.

5. Loosely or humorously, the fore leg of a quadruped; also, the arm of a human being.

If Scottish men tax our language as improper, and smile at our wing of a rabbit, let us laugh at their shoulder of a capon.

Fuller, Worthies, Norfolk, II. 445.

6. Figuratively, a means of travel, progress, or passage; usually emblematic of speed or elevation, but also used as a symbol of protecting care. See under one's wing, below.

Riches . . . make themselves wings.

Prov. xxiii. 5.

Unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings.

Mal. iv. 2.

Thou art so far before That swiftest wing of recompense is slow To overtake thee.

Shak., Macbeth, i. 4. 17.

This quiet sail is as a noiseless wing To wait me from distraction.

Byron, Childe Harold, iii. 85.

7. The act or the manner of flying; flight, literally or figuratively.

From this session interdict

Every fowl of tyrant wing.

Save the eagle, feather'd king.

Shak., Phoenix and Turtle, l. 10.

He [Plato] penetrated into the profoundest mysteries of thought, and was not deterred from speculations of bold flight and longest wing.

Jour. Spec. Phil., XIX. 52.

8†. Kind; species. Compare feather, 4. [Rare.] Of all the mad rascals (that are of this wing) the Abrahamian is the most phantastick.

Dikker, Belman of London (ed. 1608), sig. C. 3.

9. Something resembling or likened to a wing. (a) In anal, a part likened to a wing; an ala, or alate part; as, the prongs of the splenoid bone. See ala, 2, and cut under sphenoid. (b) That which moves with or receives a wing-like motion from the action of the air, as a fan used to winnow grain, the vane or sail of a windmill, the feather of an arrow, or the sail of a ship. (c) In but, a membranous expansion or thin extension of any kind, such as that of certain capsules, of samaras, etc.; also, one of the two lateral petals of a papilionaceous flower. See but, 1, trapezoid, and cut under papilionaceous. (d) In ship, the part of the hold or space between decks which is at the ship's side, more particularly at the quarter; also, the overhanging deck of a steamship, and about the paddle box, a platform by a thick plank which extends from the extremity of the paddle-box to the ship's side, to form a part of a landing projecting on one side of the central or main part. (e) In tree, the longer side of a crown or horn-work, uniting it to the main work. (f) A leaf of a gate, double door, screen, or the like, which may be folded or otherwise moved back. (g) The laterally extending part of a plowshare, which cuts the bottom of the furrow. (h) In canon, the extension endwise of a dam, sometimes at an angle with the main part.

Winged figure. (a) In anal, a part likened to a wing; an ala, or alate part; as, the prongs of the splenoid bone. See ala, 2, and cut under sphenoid. (b) That which moves with or receives a wing-like motion from the action of the air, as a fan used to winnow grain, the vane or sail of a windmill, the feather of an arrow, or the sail of a ship. (c) In but, a membranous expansion or thin extension of any kind, such as that of certain capsules, of samaras, etc.; also, one of the two lateral petals of a papilionaceous flower. See but, 1, trapezoid, and cut under papilionaceous. (d) In ship, the part of the hold or space between decks which is at the ship's side, more particularly at the quarter; also, the overhanging deck of a steamship, and about the paddle box, a platform by a thick plank which extends from the extremity of the paddle-box to the ship's side, to form a part of a landing projecting on one side of the central or main part. (e) In tree, the longer side of a crown or horn-work, uniting it to the main work. (f) A leaf of a gate, double door, screen, or the like, which may be folded or otherwise moved back. (g) The laterally extending part of a plowshare, which cuts the bottom of the furrow. (h) In canon, the extension endwise of a dam, sometimes at an angle with the main part.

(2) A side dam on a river-shore for the purpose of contracting the channel. (3) A lateral extension of an abutment. See wing-wall. E. H. Knight. (j) One of the sides of the stage of a theater; also, one of the long narrow scenes which fill up the picture on the side of the stage. See cuts under stage. (k) One of the two outside divisions of an army or fleet in battle-array; usually called the right wing and left wing, and distinguished from the center.

And this nombre of folk is with outen the princypalle Hoost, and with outen Wenges ordeyned for the Bataylle.

Manderille, Travels, p. 275.

The Earl of Mar the right wing guided.

Battle of Alford (Child's Ballads, VII. 239).

The defence of the artillery was committed to the left wing.

Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 12.

(l) A shoulder-knot, or small epaulet; specifically, a projecting piece of stuff, perhaps only a raised seam or welt, worn in the sixteenth century on the shoulder, at or near the insertion of the sleeve.

I would have mine such a suit without difference, such stuff, such a wing, such a sleeve.

B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, iii. 1.

(m) A strip of leather or the like attached to the skirt of the runner in a grain-mill to sweep the meal into the spout. (n) The side or displayed part of a dash-board. (o) A projecting part of a hand seine on each side of the central part, or bag, serving to collect the fish, and lead them into the bag. (p) A thin, broad, projecting piece on a gudgeon, to prevent it from turning in its socket.

10. A flock or company (of plover). H. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 533.—Angle of the wing, in ornith, the carpal angle; the bend or flexure of the wing. See shoulder, n., 5.—Anterior wings, in entom, the upper, front, or fore wings, when there are two pairs; the mesothoracic wings, in any case.—Bastard wing, in ornith, same as alula. See cuts there and under covert.—Bend of the wing. Same as angle of the wing.—Convolute, deflexed, dentate, digitate, divergent, erect, falcate wings. See the adjectives.—Dragon's wings. See dragon.—Expanse or extent of wing, in zool, wing-spread. See expanse, n., 2, and spread, n., 12.—False wing, in ornith, the bastard wing, alula, or ala spuria. See alula (with cut), and cut under covert.—Flexure of the wing. See flexure.—Folded wings. See fold, v., Diptera, Vespidae, and wasp, l.—Gray-goose wing, a feather of a goose as used on an arrow.

Our Englishmen in fight did chuse

The gallant gray goose wing.

True Tale of Robin Hood (Child's Ballads, V. 370).

Inferior margin of a wing, inferior surface of a wing, inferior wings. See inferior.—Inner margin of the wing. See inner.—Length of wing, in ornith, the shortest distance from the flexure or carpal angle to the point of the wing or wing-tip.—Metathoracic wings. See metathoracic.—On or upon the wing. (a) Flying; as, to shoot birds on the wing.

The bird

Couper, Task, vi. 931.

That flutters least is longest on the wing.

(b) Figuratively, in motion; traveling; active; busy. I have been, since I saw you in town, pretty much on the wing, at Hampton, Twickenham, and elsewhere.

Gray, Letters, I. 369.

(c) Taking flight; departing; vanishing. Your wits are all upon the wing, just a-going.

Vanbrugh, Confederacy, iv. 1.

Petiolate wing. See petiolate.—Plane wings. See plane.—Plicate wings. Same as folded wings.—Point of the wing, in ornith, the end of the longest primary. See wing tip.—Posterior margin of the wing. See posterior.—Posterior wings, in entom, the under or hinder wings, when there are two pairs; the metathoracic wings, in any case.—Reversed, spurious, superior wings. See the adjectives.—Tail of the wing. See tail.—Tectiform wings, in entom, roof-shaped wings; wings held sloping like the roof of a house when the insect rests.—To clip the wings. See clip.—To drop to wing. See drop.—To make or take wing, to fly; take flight; depart.

Light chickens; and the crow

Makes wing to the rooky wood.

Shak., Macbeth, iii. 2. 51.

It is a fearful thing

To see the human soul take wing

In any shape, in any mood.

Byron, Prisoner of Chillon, vii.

Tumid wing. See tumid.—Under one's wing, under one's protection, care, or patronage; with reference to the sheltering of chickens under the wings of the hen, as in the New Testament use.

Jerusalem, Jerusalem, that sleepest prophetis and stonyst hem that ben sent to thee, how oft wold I cecile togidre thi sonys, as an heume goddeth togidre hir chickenys under hir wengys, and thou woldist nat? Wyclif, Mat. xxiii. 37.

Under wings, in entom, the posterior wings, when there are two pairs, more or less overlaid by the upper wings.—Unequal wings. See unequal.—Upper wings, in entom, the anterior wings, when there are two pairs, or their equivalents, as elytra and tégmina, which overlie the posterior wings wholly or partly.—Vertical wings, in entom, wings held upright when the insect rests, as those of a butterfly; erect wings.—Wing-and-wing, the condition of a ship sailing before the wind with studding-sails on both sides; sail also of fore-and-aft vessels (schooners) when they are sailing with the wind right aft, the foresail hoisted out on one side, and the mainsail on the other. Also goose-winged.—Wings conjoined, in her, see ch. Wings displayed, in her, having the wings expanded; said of a bird used as a bearing.

wing (wing), v. [wing, n.] I. trans. 1. To equip with wings for flying; specifically, to feather (an arrow).

Marriage Love's object is; at whose bright eyes He lights his torches, and calls them his skies. For her he wings his shoulders.

B. Jonson, The Barriers.

So the struck eagle, stretch'd upon the plain, . . . View'd his own feather on the fatal dart. And wing'd the shaft that quiver'd in his heart.

Byron, Eng. Bards and Scotch Reviewers, l. 829.

2. Figuratively, to qualify for flight, elevation, rapid motion, etc.; especially, to lend speed or celerity to.

Foot, all this is wrong! This wings his pursuit, and will be before me. I am lost for ever!

Beau. and Fl., Wit at Several Weapons, v. 1.

Ambition wings his spirit.

Lust's Dominion, i. 2.

3. To supply with wings or side parts, divisions, or projections, as an army, a house, etc.; flank. They thus directed, we will follow

In the main battle, whose puissance on either side

Shall be well winged with our chiefest horse.

Shak., Rich. III., v. 3. 300.

Close to the limb of the sun, where the temperature and pressure are highest, the hydrogen is in such a state that the lines of its spectrum are widened and winged.

C. A. Young, The Sun, p. 197.

4. To brush or clean with a wing, usually that of a turkey.

Shut in from all the world without,

We sat the clean-winged hearth about.

Whittier, Snow-Bound.

5. To bear in flight; transport on or as on wings.

I, an old turtle,

Will wing me to some wither'd bough.

Shak., W. T., v. 3. 133.

His arms and eager eyes ejecting flame,

Far wing'd before his squadron Tancred came.

Brooke, tr. of Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, iii.

6. To perform or accomplish by means of wings.

This last and Godlike Act atchiev'd,

To heav'n she wing'd her flight.

Prior, The Viceroy, st. 44.

From Samos have I wing'd my way.

Conyngre, Semele, ii. 1.

He [Rip Van Winkle] looked round, but could see nothing but a crow winging its solitary flight across the mountain.

Irring, Sketch-Book, p. 52.

7. To traverse in flight. The crows and choughs that wing the midway air Show scarce so gross as beetles.

Shak., Lear, iv. 6. 13.

Not man alone, but all that roam the wood,

Or wing the sky, or roll along the flood.

Pope, Essay on Man, iii. 120.

8†. To carve, as a quail or other small bird. Wyng that partyche. Babes Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 265.

Good man! him list not spend his idle meals

In quinsing plovers, or in winging quails.

Bp. Hall, Satires, IV. ii. 44.

9. To wound or disable in the wing, as a bird; colloquially, to wound (a person) in the arm or shoulder, or some other not vital part.

What are the odds now that he doesn't wing me? These green-horns generally hit everything but the man they aim at.

Coburn the Younger, Poor Gentleman, v. 3.

II. intrans. To fly; soar; travel on the wing.

We, poor unfledged,

Have never wing'd from view of the nest.

Shak., Cymbeline, iii. 3. 28.

As the bird wings and sings,

Let us cry, "All good things

Are ours!" Browning, Rabbi Ben Ezra.

wing-band (wing'band), n. Same as wing-bar. wing-bar (wing'bär), n. A colored bar or band across a bird's wing; technically, such a band formed by the tips of the greater or median wing-coverts, or both of these, and placed between the wing-bow and the wing-bay. Such are found in uncounted different birds. See cut under solitary.

wing-bay (wing'bä), n. The plumage-marking of a bird formed by the secondary feathers of the wing, when the wing is closed and these feathers differ in color from the rest of the plumage; so called because in the black-breasted red game type of coloring this marking is of a bay color. See speculum, 3 (b), and first cut under wing.

wing-beat (wing'hêt), n. A wing-stroke; one completed motion of the wing in the act of flying.

wing-bow (wing'bô), n. In poultry, and hence in other birds, the plumage-marking on the shoulder or bend of the wing; distinctive coloration of the lesser coverts collectively; thus, in the black-breasted red gamecock the wing-bows are crimson. See cuts under Agelæus and sea-eagle.

wing-case (wing'käs), n. The hard, horny case or cover which overlies the functional wing of many insects, especially of Coleoptera; the elytrium. In hemipterous insects the wing-cases are technically called hemelytra. Wing-cases are always the modified fore wings; when these wings are but little modified, as in orthopterous insects, they are called tegmina. See cuts under beetle, chrysalis, clavus, Coleoptera, and katydid. Also wing-cover.

wing-cell (wing'sel), n. In entom., any one of the spaces between the nerves or veins of the wing. See cuts under nerve, venation, and wing.—Didymous, petiolate, radiated wing-cells. See the adjectives.

wing-compass (wing'kum'pas), n. A compass with an arc-shaped piece which passes through the opposite leg, and is clamped by a set-screw.

wing-conch (wing'kongk), n. A wing-shell.

wing-cover (wing'kuv'er), n. In entom., same as wing-case.—Mutilated wing-covers. See mutilated.

wing-covert (wing'kuv'ert), n. In ornith., any one of the small feathers which overlie or underlie the flight-feathers of the wing; a covert of the wing. See covert, n., 6 (with cut), terrics, and first cut under wing.—Under wing-coverts. See under.

winged (wing'ed), a. [< ME. winged, winged; < wing + -ed.] 1. Having or wearing wings, in any sense; as, the winged horse (Pegasus); the winged god (Mercury); a winged (feathered) arrow; a winged ship.

Steer hither, steer your winged pines,

All beaten mariners. W. Browne, Syrans' Song.
There is also a little contemptible winged creature, an inhabitant of my aerial element.

I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 28.

2. In her., having wings. Specifically—(a) Noting a bird when the wings are of a different tincture from the body. [Rare.] (b) Noting an object not usually having wings; as, a winged column.

3. In bot., anat., and conch., alate; alated; having a part resembling or likened to a wing; as, a winged shell or bone; a winged seed. See cuts under sphenoid, wing-shell, and wing, n., 9 (c).—4. Abounding with wings, and hence with birds; swarming with birds. [Rare.]

The wing'd air dark'd with plumes.

Milton, Comus, l. 730.

5. Moving or passing on or as on wings; swift; rapid.

Ther mighte I seen

Winged wondres faste fleete

Chaucer, House of Fame, l. 2118.

Come, Tamburlaine! now what thy winged sword.

Marlowe, Tamburlaine, l. ii. 3.

With Fear oppress'd,

In winged Words he thus the Queen address'd.

Congreve, Byrn to Venus.

6. Soaring; lofty; elevated; sublime.

How winged the sentiment that virtue is to be followed for its own sake, because its essence is divine!

J. S. Barford, Michael Angelo, v.

He [Emerson] looked far away over the heads of his hearers, with a vague kind of expectation, as into some private heaven of invention, and the winged period came at last obedient to his spell. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 283.

7. Disabled in the wing; having the wing broken.

You will often recover winged birds as full of life as before the bone was broken. Coxe, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 16.

winter¹ (win'tér), n. and a. [*< ME. winter, wynter, < AS. winter (pl. winter or wintra), winter, also a year, = OS. winter = OFries. D. LG. winter = OHG. winter, MHG. G. winter = Icel. vetr, rittr (for *rittr), mod. vetr = Sw. Dan. vinter = Goth. wintrus, winter, year; ulterior origin doubtful. The supposed connection with wind (as if winter were the 'windy season') is phonetically improbable. Some suggest a connection with OIr. find, white, Old Gaulish Findo in several proper names.] I. n. 1. The cold season of the year. Astronomically winter is reckoned to begin in northern latitudes when the sun enters Capricorn, or at the solstice (about December 21st), and to end at the equinox in March; but in ordinary speech winter comprises the three coldest months—December, January, and February being reckoned the winter months in the United States, and November, December, and January in Great Britain. In southern latitudes winter corresponds to the northern summer. See season.*

As an hoseonde hopeth after an hard winter,
Yf god gyveth hym the lif, to have a good heruest.
Piers Plowman (C), xiii. 196.

Lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come.

And there I saw mage Merlin, whose vast wit
And hundred winters are but as the hands
Of loyal vassals toiling for their liege.
Tennyson, Coming of Arthur.

3. Figuratively, a period analogous to the winter of the year; a season of inertia or suspended activity, or of cheerlessness, dreariness, or adversity.

Now is the winter of our discontent
Made glorious summer by this sun of York.
Shak., Rich. III., l. 1. 1.

The winter of sorrow best shows
The truth of a friend such as you.
Cowper, Winter Nosegay.

4. The last portion of corn brought home at the end of harvest; or, the state of affairs when all the grain on a farm is reaped and brought under cover; also, the rural feast held in celebration of the ingathering of the crops. [Scotch.]

For now the maiden has been win,
And Winter is at last brought in;
And syne they dance and had the kirk.
The Har'st Rig, st. 136. (Jamieson.)

II. a. Occurring in, characteristic of, or pertaining to winter; wintry.

Youth like summer morn, age like winter weather.

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iv. 10. 74.

Why, then, should I now, now when glorious peace
Triumphs in change of pleasures, be wip'd off,
Like a useless moth, from courtly ease?

Fort, Love's Sacrifice, i. 1.

Oh, thou has nam'd a word that wipes away
All thoughts revengful.

Beau. and Fl., Maid's Tragedy, ii. 1.

Yet here hee smoothly seeks to wipe off all the envy of his civil Government upon his Substitutes and under Officers.

Milton, Eikonoklastes, i.

3. Figuratively, to cleanse, as from evil practices or abuses; clear, as of disadvantage or superfluity.

I will wipe Jerusalem as a man wipeth a dish.

2 Ki. xxi. 13.

4. To cheat; defraud; trick.

If they by covin or guile be wiped beside their goods, so that no violence be done to their bodies, they ease their anger by abstaining from occupying with that nation until they have made satisfaction.

Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), ii. 10.

We are but quit; you fool us of our moneys
In every cause, in every quiddit wipe us.

Fletcher, Spanish Curate, iv. 5.

5. To stroke or strike gently; tap.

Thoume he toke me by the hande from the grounde and wyped my face with a rose and kyssed me.

Joseph of Arimathea (E. E. T. S.), p. 30.

6. To beat; chastise. [Slang.]—7. In plumbing, to apply (solder) without the use of a soldering-iron, by allowing the solder to cool into a semi-fluid condition, and then applying it by wiping it over the part to be soldered by the use of a pad of leather or cloth. See wiping, 2.—To wipe another's nose. See nose.—To wipe the (or one's) eye. See eye.

II. intrans. To make strokes with a rubbing or sweeping motion.

He comes full upon it, seated upright, with its back against a tree, wiping at the dogs swarming upon it, right and left, with its huge paws.

W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 205.

wipe¹ (wip), n. [Early mod. E. also wype; < wipen, v.] 1. The act or process of wiping clean or dry; a sweeping stroke of one thing over another; a rub; a brush.

He often said of himself, with a melancholy wipe of his sleeve across his brow, that he "didn't know which-a-way to turn."

George Eliot, Felix Holt, viii.

2. A quick or hard stroke; a blow, literally or figuratively; a cut; now regarded as slang.

Since you were the first that layde hand to weapon, the fault is not mine if I haue happened to give you a wipe.

Guevara, Letters (tr. by Hellowes, 1577), p. 235.

To statesmen would you give a wipe,

You print it in Italie type. Swift, On Poetry.

3. The mark of a blow or wound; a scar; a brand. [Rare.]

The blenish that will never be forgot;

Worse than a slavish wipe, or birth-hour's blot.

Shak., Lucrece, l. 537.

4. Something used in wiping; specifically, a handkerchief. [Slang.]

I'm Inspector Field!

And this here warment 's prizzed your wipe.

Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 355.

"And what have you got, my dear?" said Fagin to Charley Bates. "Wipes," replied Master Bates, at the same time producing four pocket-handkerchiefs.

Dickens, Oliver Twist, ix.

5. pl. A fence of brushwood. Hallivill. [Prov. Eng.]—6. Same as wiper, 3.

As the cam, which is a revolving wheel with twelve or fourteen projecting teeth or wipers, revolves.

W. H. Greenwood, Steel and Iron, p. 308.

wipe² (wip), n. Same as *wiper*².

wiper (wip'er), n. [< wipen + -er]. 1. One who or that which wipes.

Another movement [of a soldering-machine] carries the can body across the wiper, which removes the superfluous solder.

Sci. Amer., S. S., LXIII. 297.

2. That on which anything is wiped, as a hand-towel or a handkerchief.

The wipers for their noses. B. Jonson, Masque of Owls.

3. In mach. a piece projecting generally from a horizontal axle, for the purpose of raising stampers, pounders, or pistons in a vertical direction and letting them fall by their own weight. Wipers are employed in fulling-mills, stamping-mills, oil-mills, powder-mills, etc. Also wipe.—4. A steel implement for cleaning the bore of a musket, etc. It has two twisted arms, screws on the end of a ramrod, and carries a piece of cloth or a bunch of tow. The larger wipers for cleaning cannons are attached to a wooden stick, and are termed canons or sponges. See cut under gun.

wiper-wheel (wip'er-hwel), n. A cam-wheel serving to lift a trip-hammer, a stamp, or the like, allowing it to fall again by its own weight. See cam.

wiping (wip'ing), n. 1. The act of one who wipes; specifically, a beating; a thrashing; a trimming. [Slang.]

Even in the domestic circle one can have a choice of "a towelling," "a hasting," "a clouting," . . . "a trimming," or "a wiping," when occasion requires.

N. and Q., 7th ser., VII. 153.

2. In plumbing: (a) The removal, with a greased cloth, of solder which has been poured upon a joint to heat it before soldering. (b) The operation of shaping with a wooden pad a mass of solder applied to form a wiped joint.

wiping-rod (wip'ing-rod), n. See wiper, 1.

wirdt, wirdet, n. Obsolete variants of wird.
wire¹ (wir), n. and a. [< ME. wir, wyr, < AS. wir, a wire, a spiral ornament of wire. = MLG. wire, LG. wir, wire; cf. OHG. wiara, MHG. wire, fine-drawn gold, gold ornament, = Lecl. rirr, wire (cf. Sw. rirr, wind, twist); cf. Lith. wela, iron wire, L. rirre, armlets (see rirre, f. rirre). I. n. 1. An extremely elongated body of elastic material; specifically, a slender bar of metal, commonly circular in section, from the size which can be bent by the hand with some difficulty down to a fine thread. Wire was originally made by hammering, a sort of groove in the anvil serving to determine the size. It is now drawn by powerful machinery, and passed through a series of holes constantly diminishing in size. Wire of square section, flat like a tape, etc., is also made.

Fetisch hie fyngres were fretted with golde wire.

Piers Plowman (B), ii. 11.

Wyrre. Filum, vel ferritulum . . . (filum creum vel fer-rum, F.).

Prompt. Pare., p. 530.

At what period and among what people the art of working up pure gold, or gilded silver, into a long, round hair-like thread—into what may be correctly called wire—began, is quite unknown.

S. K. Handbook Textile Fabrics, p. 22.

2. A twisted thread; a filament.

Upon a courser, starting as the fyr,

Men might turne him with a litel wyr,

Sit Eneas, lyk Phebus to devyse.

Chaucer, Good Women, l. 1205.

3. A quantity of wire used for various purposes, especially in electric transmission, as in case of the telephone, the telegraph, electric lighting, etc.; specifically, a telegraph-wire, and hence (colloquially) the telegraph system itself; as, to send orders by wire.

It is ridiculous to make love by wire.

C. D. Warner, The Pilgrimage, p. 301.

Faraday's term "electrode," literally a way for electricity to travel along, might be well applied to designate the insulated conductor along which the electric messenger is despatched. It is, however, more commonly and familiarly called "the wire" or "the line."

Enye, Brit., XXIII. 113.

4. A metallic string of a musical instrument; hence, poetically, the instrument itself.

Sound Lydian wires, once make a pleasing note

On nectar streams of your sweet airs to float.

Marston, Antonio and Melinda, l. v. 1.

Listening to what unborn Apollo sings

To the touch of golden wires.

Milton, Vacation Exercise, l. 38.

With wire and catgut he concludes the day,

Quav'ring and semiquav'ring care away.

Conquer, Progress of Error, l. 126.

5. The lash; the scourge; alluding to the use of metallic whips.

Thou shalt be whipp'd with wire.

Shak., A. and C., ii. 5. 65.

Lo! You may hear what time of day it is, the chimes of Bedlam goes.

Alb. Peace, peace, or the wire comes!

Middleton and Rowley, Changeing, i. 2.

6. In ornith., one of the extremely long, slender, wire-like filaments or shafts of the plumage of various birds. See wired, wire-tailed, and cut under Vidua.—7. pl. Figuratively, that by which any organization or body of persons is controlled and directed; now used chiefly in political slang. See wire-pulling.

Now, however, there was a vacancy, and they [the politicians] scented their prey afar off. The usual manipulation of the wires began, and they were managed with the usual skill.

The Nation, XVI. 330.

8. A pick-pocket with long fingers, expert at picking women's pockets. Hotten. [Thieves' slang.]

He was worth 20*l.* a week, he said, as a wire—that is, a picker of ladies' pockets.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 410.

9. A fiber of eoweb, a fine platinum wire, or a line upon glass, fixed in the focus of a telescope, to aid in comparing the positions of objects.—Barbed, beaded, dead wire. See the adjectives.—Binding-wire. See binding.—Compound telegraph-wire, a wire composed of a steel center surrounded by a copper tube, the object being to obtain the necessary conductivity and strength with less material than is required when iron wire is used.—Dovetail wire, a wire having a wedge-shaped section.—Earth wire. See earth-wire.—Filling the wire, in teleg., putting such a number of stations on one wire that it is occupied during the whole day.—Gold wire, a wire formed of a core of silver covered with gold. It may be drawn out to the fineness of thread.—Ground-wire. Same as earth-wire.—Hollow wire, in goldsmithing, small tubes used for making joints, as in the cases of watches, etc.—Latten live, phantom wire. See the qualifying words.—Leading-in wire, the wire which makes connection between a telegraph-line and a telegraph office.—Open wires, in teleg., exposed or overhead bare wires. Also sometimes used for open circuit.—Saddle wire, a telegraph-wire carried on insulators fixed directly to the tops of the poles.—Taped wires, wires covered with tape for insulation or weather-protection.—Telodynamic wire, a wire used to transmit force or power, as in giving motion to a machine from a countershaft or from the driving-pulley of an engine.—To pull or work (the) wires. See wire-pulling.—Under-takers' wire, a kind of insulated wire the use of which was at one time authorized by the fire-insurance under-writers for electric-lighting purposes. The name was given because of the defective quality or insulation of this wire and the consequent danger in its use. [Colloq.]—Wire-covering machine, a machine for covering wire with a finer wire or with thread.—Wire of Lapland, a shining slender material made from the sinews of the reindeer, soaked in water, beaten, and spun into a sort of thread of great strength. These threads are dipped in melted tin, and drawn through a horn with a hole in it. The Laplanders use this wire for embroidering their clothes.—Wire-twisting machine, a machine or tool for joining ends of wire, as sections of fencing- or telegraph-wires, etc., by twisting them on each other.—Woven-wire cloth. See fathling.

II. a. Made of wire; consisting of or fitted with wires; as, a wire sieve; a wire bird-cage.

He did him to the wire-window,

As fast as he could gang.

Fine of Frendraught (Child's Ballads, VI. 180).

Wire armor. Same as chain-mail. See mail, 3.—Wire belting, belts or straps for machinery, made of wire instead of leather.—Wire bent. See bent.—Wire bridge.

(a) Same as suspension-bridge. See bridge (with cut). (b) In elect., a kind of Wheatstone bridge in which two adjacent resistances are formed by a wire which can be divided in any ratio by means of a sliding contact and a graduated scale.—Wire cables. See cable.—Wire cartridge, a cartridge for a shotgun, having the charge of shot inclosed in a network of wire to concentrate the discharge.

Wire cartridges are woven wire receptacles in which shot are mixed with bone dust. Sportsman's Gazetteer, p. 568.

Wire cloth. See cloth.—Wire entanglements, in fort. See entanglement.—Wire fence, gauze, guard, gun. See the nouns.—Wire mattress. See mattress.—Wire rope. See rope.—Wire-spring colling-machine, a machine for making spiral metal springs.—Wire stitch. See stitch, 9.—Wire wheel. See wheel.

wire¹ (wir), v.; pret. and pp. wired, ppr. wiring. [< wirn, v.] I. trans. 1. To bind, fit, or otherwise provide with wire; put wire in, on, around, through, etc.; as, to wire corks in bottling liquors; to wire beads; to wire a fence; to wire a bird-skin, as in taxidermy; to wire a house for electric lighting.

As bats at the wired window of a dairy,

They beat their vans.

Shelley, Witch of Atlas, xvi.

In 1711 the coats used to be wired to make them stick out. J. Ashton, Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, I. 151.

Many of the houses built during the past two years were wired when constructed.

Electric Rev. (Amer.), XV. 4.

2. To snare by means of a wire; as, to wire a bird.

Donald Caird can wire a markin,

Kens the wiles o' dun-deer stakin'.

Scott, Donald Caird's Come Again.

3. To send through a telegraphic wire: send by telegraph, as a message: telegraph: as, wire a reply. [Colloq.]

The coronation of the Emperor of Austria as King of Hungary, the canonization of saints of Rome, were celebrated to New York, just as the Washington news is wired to the same place. Athenaeum, No. 2154, p. 207.

4. To be wound or bound about like wire: encircle. [Rare.]

But, as the Vine her lovely film doth wire, Grasp both our Hearts, and flame with fresh Desire.
Hemell, Letters, I. i. 14.

5. In surg., to maintain the ends of (a fractured bone) in close apposition by means of wire passed through holes drilled in the bone.

II. intrans. 1. To flow in currents as thin as wire. [Rare.]

Then in small streams (through all the isle wiring)
Sends it to every part, both heat and life inspiring.
P. Fletcher, Purple Island, iv.

2. To communicate by means of a telegraphic wire: telegraph.

I told her in what way I had learned of her accident and her whereabouts, and I added that I had wired to her husband. D. Christie Murray, Weaker Vessel, xxxiii.

To wire away. Same as to wire in. [Slang.]

Nevertheless, in one fashion or another he "keeps wiring away," stopping now and then to listen as well as his throbbing pulses will allow.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 93.

To wire in, to apply one's self closely and perseveringly to anything; press forward; go ahead. [Slang.]

wire² (wir'), n. A corruption of wire.

wire-bent (wir'bent), n. Same as mat-grass, 2.

wire-bird (wir'bêrd), n. A species of plover.

[At St. Helena] are a few Wild Goats, a kind of Rock Pigeon, and a species of Plover called the "Wire Bird."
W. B. Greener, The Gull, p. 657.

wire-cutter (wir'kut'er), n. A form of nippers with sharp edges or blades, for cutting wire.

wired (wir'd), a. [wire + -ed]. 1. In ornith., having wires or wiry feathers: chiefly in composition: as, the twelve-wired bird of paradise. Compare wire-tailed, and see wire, n. 6, and cuts under Seleucides, thread-tailed, Trochilidae, and Vidua.—2. In croquet, protected or obstructed by an intervening wire.

wire-dancer (wir'dân'sêr), n. One who dances or performs other feats upon a wire stretched at some distance above the ground. Compare rape-dancer.

Mr. Maddox, the celebrated wire-dancer, . . . had also been engaged as an auxiliary to the same theatre.
Baker, Biographia Dramatica (ed. 1811), I. 127.

wire-dancing (wir'dân'sing), n. The performance or the profession of a wire-dancer.

Wire-dancing, at least so much of it as I have seen exhibited, appears to me to be misnamed; it consists rather of various feats of balancing, the actor sitting, standing, lying, or walking upon the wire, which at the same time is usually swung backwards and forwards.
Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 316.

wiredraw (wir'drâ), v.; pret. wiredrew, pp. wiredrawn, ppr. wiredrawing. I. trans. 1. To draw (metal) out into wire: especially, to form into wire, as a metal, by forcibly pulling through a series of holes gradually decreasing in diameter.—2. To draw out to greater length; extend in quantity or time; stretch, especially to excess; prolong; protract.

A hungry surgeon often produces and wire-draws his cure.
Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 276.

He never desisted from pulling his beard till he had wiredrawn it down to his feet.

Maunder, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 42.

3. To draw out into excessive tenuity or subtlety, as a thought, argument, or discourse; spin out, especially by useless refinements, hair-splitting, or the like; render prolix at the expense of force and clearness.

The devil perhaps may want his due if authority be not reviled against, and church scholasticism oration hypocritically stretched out to the rabble of their disobedient and undisciplined who . . . do extol the vaporous matter with a wire-drawn speech and blustering courtesy.

Tom Nash his Ghost, p. 8.

What they call improvement is generally . . . spinning out their Author's sense till his wiredrawing; that is, weak and slender. . . .
Forster, On the Classics (ed. 1715), p. 163.

The development of the circumplex (special pleading) produced such a . . . wiredrawn distinction that the most subtle intellect found it difficult to understand them.
Forster, Hortensius, p. 341.

4. To stretch or strain unwarrantably; wrest; pervert; distort.

You injuriously wire-draw him to Pre-bysters and foist in (Seniores and Prepositi) which are far from the clause and matter. Ep. Hall, Def. of Handed Remonstr., § 8.

Nor am I for forcing, or wiredrawing, the sense of the text so as to make it designedly forebode the King's death.
South, Sermons, V. ii.

I have been wrongfully accused, and my sense been wiredrawn into blasphemy.
Dryden.

5. To beguile; cheat.

To wire draw, . . . to decoy a Man, or get somewhat out of him.
Bailey, 1731.

6. In the steam-engine, to draw off (steam) by one or more small apertures, materially reducing its pressure after the passage.

II. intrans. To follow the profession, practice, or methods of a wire-drawer; especially, to use unwarrantable methods; pervert; cheat.

Thou hadst land and thousands, which thou spend'st,
And flung'st away, and yet it flows in double.
I purchas'd, wrong, and wire-draw'd for my wealth, Lost, and was cozen'd. Beau. and FL., Scornful Lady, v.

wiredrawer (wir'drâ'êr), n. [wire-draw + -er]. 1. One who or that which draws metal into wire.

Yet they will take upon them to displace a bishop and learned divines, and place in their room weavers and wire-drawers.
Tom Nash his Ghost, p. 9.

Then again they [wires] are nealed the third time, . . . and delivered to the small Wire Drawers.
Rap., Eng. Words (ed. 1691), p. 195.

2. Figuratively, one who spins out unduly; one who carries a matter into useless subtleties, with or without perversion of meaning.

Either shut me out for a Wrangler, or cast me off for a Wire-drawer.
Lyly, Euphues, Anat. of Wit, p. 106.

3. A stingy, grasping person. Hallivell.

wiredrawing (wir'drâ'ing), n. [Verbal n. of wire-draw, v.]. 1. The act or art of extending ductile metals into wire.

The metal is first hammered into a bar, and then passed successively through a series of holes in a hardened steel plate, gradually diminishing in diameter until the requisite degree of fineness is attained. Extremely fine gold and platinum wires for the spider-lines of telescope-microscopes are formed by coating the metal with silver, and then drawing it down to a great tenuity through a draw-plate the holes of which are made in a diamond or ruby. The silver is then removed by nitric acid, leaving an almost invisible interior wire, which has been attenuated to a diameter of only $\frac{1}{100000}$ inch.

2. Figuratively, the act of drawing out an argument or a discussion to prolixity and attenuation by useless refinements, distinctions, disquisitions, etc.

The counsel on the other side declared that such twisting, such wiredrawing, was never seen in a court of justice.
Maunder.

Out of all that rubbish of Arab idolatries, . . . rumours and hypotheses of Greek and Jews, with their idle wire-drawings, this wild man of the Desert [Mahomet] . . . had seen into the kernel of the matter.
Carlyle, Hero-Worship, ii.

Wiredrawing-bench, an apparatus for wiredrawing, consisting of a reel on which the wire to be drawn is wound, a draw-plate and stand, and a cone-shaped drum actuated by bevel-gearing.

wire-edge (wir'êj), n. A thin, wire-like edge formed on a cutting-tool by over-sharpening it on one side, which causes the edge to turn over slightly toward the other side.

wire-edged (wir'êjd), a. Having a wire-edge.

The tool to be ground . . . will . . . become wire-edged.
Campbell, Hand-turning, p. 41.

wire-finder (wir'fin'dêr), n. A kind of telephonic detector employed to find the wires belonging to different circuits, etc. It has a magnet between the poles of which the wire is held; near the magnet is a short ear-tube with ferrotypic diaphragm; and a pulsating or interrupted current sent through the wire causes the diaphragm to sound.

wire-gage (wir'gaj), n. See gage, 2.

wire-grass (wir'grâs), n. 1. A species of meadow-grass, Poa compressa, native in the Old World, naturalized in North America. It is sometimes mistaken for the Kentucky blue-grass, Poa pratensis, but is well distinguished by its shorter leaves and smaller dense panicle, and its flattened wiry culms which are decumbent and less tall. Also called English blue-grass.

2. A valued forage grass, Eleusine Indica, perhaps native in India, now widely distributed in warm and temperate regions; it is common southward in the United States. It has thick succulent stems with radiating spikes at the summit. Also crab grass, yard-grass, and don's-tail.

3. One of various other grasses, as the Bermuda grass, Cynodon Dactylon (see grass), Sporobolus junceus, and species of Aristida in the southern United States, and Paspalum filiforme in the West Indies.

wiregrub (wir'grub), n. A wire-worm.

wire-heel (wir'hêl), n. A certain defect and disease in the feet of a horse or other beast.

wireman (wir'man), n.; pl. wiremen (-men).

A man who puts up and looks after wires, as for the telegraph, telephone, or electric lighting.

Linemen and wiremen were in great demand in New York last week. Elect. Rev. (Amer.), XVII. 286.

wire-micrometer (wir'mi-krom'e-têr), n. A micrometer with fine wires arranged in parallel and intersecting series across the field of the instrument.

wire-pan (wir'pan), n. A pan with a bottom made of wire cloth, used for baking cake, etc.

wire-pegger (wir'peg'êr), n. In shoe-manuf., a nailing- or pegging-machine for cutting wire pegs from a continuous wire and driving them into shoe-soles; a wire-nailing machine. Compare pegger and nailing-machine.

wire-puller (wir'pûl'êr), n. 1. One who pulls the wires, as of a puppet. Hence—2. One who operates by secret means; one who exercises a powerful but secret influence; an intriguer.

It was useless now to bribe the Comitia, to work with clubs and wire-pullers.
Froude, Cæsar, p. 369.

One of the great English political parties, and naturally the party supporting the Government in power, holds a conference of gentlemen to whom I hope I may without offense apply the American name wire-pullers.
Maine, Pop. Government, iv.

wire-pulling (wir'pûl'ing), n. 1. The act of pulling the wires, as of a puppet or other mechanical contrivance. Hence—2. The rousing, guiding, and controlling of any organization or body of persons, especially a political party, by underhand influence or management; intrigue, especially political intrigue.

wirer (wir'êr), n. [wire + -er]. One who wires; specifically, one who uses wires to snare game.

The nightly wirer of their innocent hare.
Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

wire-road (wir'rôd), n. Same as wireway. E. H. Knight.

wire-sewed (wir'sôd), a. Sewed with wire instead of thread: noting books and pamphlets.

wire-shafted (wir'shâf'ted), a. Devoid of webs for most or all the length of its shaft, as a feather; wired, as a bird. See wire-tailed, and cut under Seleucides.

wire-silver (wir'sil'vêr), n. Native silver in slender wire-like forms.

wiresmith (wir'smith), n. One who makes metal into wire, especially by beating or hammering.

Wire was obtained by hammering up strips of metal, and the artificers thus employed were termed in the trade wire-smiths.
The Engineer, LXVII. 209.

wire-stitched (wir'sticht), a. Noting pamphlets, etc., that are fastened with wire.

wire-straightener (wir'strât'nêr), n. An apparatus for removing bends from wire, as from that which has been coiled. The wire is pulled forcibly between three or more fixed points not in line.

wire-stretcher (wir'strech'êr), n. A hand-tool for clamping the loose ends of wires in fences and telegraph-wires, for the purpose of holding and drawing them together to make a joint.

wire-tailed (wir'tâld), a. Having wiry or wire-shafted tail-feathers, as the thread-tailed swallow, Iromitus filiferus. See cuts under thread-tailed, Trochilidae, Vidua, and Vidua.

wire-tramway (wir'tram'wâ), n. Same as wireway. E. H. Knight.

wire-twist (wir'twist'), n. A kind of gun-barrel made of a ribbon of iron and steel coiled around a mandrel and welded. The ribbon is made by welding together laminae of iron and steel, or two qualities of iron, and drawing the resulting bar between rollers. E. H. Knight.

wireway (wir'wâ), n. A system of transportation by the agency of traveling or stationary wires. Wireways are used for carrying stone, ores, clay, coal, etc., from mines to docks or railroad stations, or from docks to coal-yards, or from sewage construction-works to docks or dumping-grounds, etc. The most common form is an endless traveling wire rope, supported on posts placed at intervals along the way, or, in some instances, supported only at each end, as in the crossing of rivers or ravines, or the descent of mountain-sides. Smallerways employ fixed wires on which travel light baskets for conveying money and packages in shops. In the traveling-wire systems the freight is placed in buckets or skips hung on the wire and traveling along with it. Arrangements are made for automatic loading, starting, stopping, unloading, and switching to branch wires. Some of the traveling-wire lines used in mines are several miles long. In short lines, as in cash-carrier systems, the traveling basket, ball, or car is sometimes moved by raising one end of the wire, when the car rolls down to the cashier's desk. See cash-carrier and telephage. Also called wire-road, wire-tramway.

wire-weed (wir-wêd), n. The knot-grass Polygonum ariculare. Britten and Holland. [Prov. Eng.]

wirework (wir'wêrk), n. [= lecl, wira-wirki, wirework, filigree-work; as wire + work, n.] Fabrics made of wire, such as wire gauze and wire cloth, or objects made of wire, such as bird-cages and sponge-racks.

Penned off with netted wirework. In the clear, bright Rhone flood, are places for the swans and ducks.

Richardson, A Girle Round the Earth, xiv.

wire-worker (wir'wér'kér), n. 1. One who manufactures articles from wire.—2. Same as wire-puller.

wire-working (wir'wér'king), n. 1. The manufacture of wire, or of articles requiring wire.—2. Same as wire-pulling.

wireworks (wir'wérks), n. pl. and sing. An establishment where wire is made or fitted to some specific use.

wireworm (wir'wérn), n. 1. The slenderhard-bodied larva of any one of the click-beetles or snapping-beetles of the family Elateridae. Some of these larvae live under the loose bark of dying trees and in old logs and stumps, while many live underground, and feed on the roots of cereals and on other crops. They remain in the larval state two or more years, and are among the worst enemies of the crops in North America and Europe. Also wiregrub.

MHG. wistnom*, wisdom, knowledge, judgment, G. weisethum, knowledge, = leel, rissdom = Sw. Dan. rissdom, wisdom), < wis, wise, + dóm, condition: see wis¹ and -dóm.] 1. The property of being wise; the power or faculty of forming the fittest and truest judgment in any matter presented for consideration; a combination of discernment, discretion, and sagacity, or similar qualities and faculties, involving also a certain amount of knowledge, especially the knowledge of men and things gained by experience. It is often used in a sense nearly synonymous with discretion, or with prudence, but both of these are strictly only particular phases of wisdom. Frequently wisdom implies little more than sound and sober common-sense: hence it is often opposed to folly.

Then seide thei, he comen assent, thei wolde counseile with Merlyn, that hadde grete wisdom.

Melvin (E. E. T. S.), i. 95.

The beste wisdom that I can ys to doe well & drede no man.

5. Skill; skillfulness.

And I have filled him with the spirit of God, in wisdom, and in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship.

Ex. xxxi. 3.

[In Scripture the word is sometimes specifically used, especially in Paul's Epistles, in an obprobrious sense to designate the theological speculations (1 Cor. i. 19, 20) or rhetorical arts (1 Cor. ii. 5) current among the Greeks and Romans in the first century; sometimes in a good sense to designate spiritual perception, accompanied with obedience to the divine law (Prov. iii. 13; Acts vi. 3). Sometimes (as in Prov. viii.) it has personal attributes assigned to it.]

Book of Wisdom of Jesus. See Ecclesiasticius. Book of Wisdom of Solomon, one of the deuterocanonical books of the Old Testament. (See deuterocanonical and Apocrypha.) Tradition ascribes its authorship to Solomon; but by most modern Protestant theologians it is attributed to an Alexandrian Jew of the first or second century B. C. The shorter title Wisdom, or Book of Wisdom, is commonly applied to this book, but not to Ecclesiasticius. Abbreviated Wisd. Salt of wisdom. Same as sal adalambroth (which see, under ad). = Syn. 1. Knowledge, Prudence, Wisdom, Discretion, Providence, Forecast, Provision. Knowledge has several steps, as the perception of facts, the accumulation of facts, and familiarity by experience, but it does not include action, nor the power of judging what is best in ends to be pursued or in means for attaining those ends. Prudence is sometimes the power of judging what are the best means for attaining desired ends; it may be a word or action, or it may be simply the power to avoid danger. It implies deliberation and care, whether in acting or refraining from action. Wisdom chooses not only the best means but also the best ends; it is thus far higher than prudence, which may be choosing wrong ends go altogether astray; hence also it is often used in the Bible for piety. As compared with knowledge, it sees more deeply into the heart of things and more broadly and comprehensively sums up relations, draws conclusions, and acts upon them; hence a man may abound in knowledge and be very deficient in wisdom, or he may have a practical wisdom with a comparatively small stock of knowledge. Discretion is the power to judge critically what is correct and proper, sometimes without suggesting action, but more often in view of action proposed or possible. Like prudence the word implies great caution, and takes for granted that a man will not act contrary to what he knows. Providence looks much further ahead than prudence or discretion, and plans and acts according to what it sees. It may be remarked that provision, which is from the same root as providence and prudence, is primarily a word of action, while they are only secondarily so. Forecast is a grave word for looking carefully forward to the consequences of present situations and decisions; it implies, like all these words except knowledge, that one will act according to what he can make out of the future. See cautious, astute, and genius.

I wisdom dwell with prudence, and find out knowledge of witty inventions.

Prov. viii. 12.

Knowledge and wisdom, far from being one,

Have oftentimes no connexion. Knowledge dwells

In heads replete with thoughts of other men;

Wisdom in minds attentive to their own.

Knowledge, a rude, unprofitable mass,

The mere materials with which Wisdom builds,

Till smooth'd, and squar'd, and fitted to its place,

Does but encumber whom it seems to enrich.

Knowledge is proud that he has learn'd so much;

Wisdom is humble that he knows no more.

Cowper, Task, vi. 88.

Men of god discretion

Sold exence and lone hinchowne,

That cummand wes in literature.

Wyntown, quoted in Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), [Pref., p. xxv.]

This was your providence,

Your wisdom, to elect this gentleman,

Your excellent forecast in the man, your knowledge!

Fletcher, Rule a Wife, iii. 1.

The Wishtonwish of the Indians, prairie dogs of some travellers, . . . reside on the prairies of Louisiana in towns or villages, having an evident police established in their communities. . . . As you approach their towns, you are saluted on all sides by the cry of Wishtonwish, from which they derive their name with the Indians, uttered in a shrill and piercing manner.
Z. M. Pike, Voyage to Sources of the Arkansas, etc.
(1810), p. 156.

[Misunderstood by Cooper as a name for the whip-poor-will, it was so used by him in his novel "The Wept of Wish-ton-Wish," and elsewhere.

"He speaks of the wish-ton-wish," said the scout.
"Well, since you like his whistle, it shall be your signal.
Remember, then, when you hear the whip-poor-will's call three times repeated, you are to come into the bushes."
J. F. Cooper, Last of Mohicans, xxii.]

wish-wash (wish'wash), n. [A varied redupl.
of wash.] Anything wishy-washy; especially,
a thin, sloppy drink. [Colloq.]

wishy-washy (wish'i-wosh'i), a. and n. [A varied redupl. of wishy. Cf. wish-wash.] 1. a.
Very thin and weak; diluted; sloppy; originally used to note liquid substances; hence, feeble; lacking in substantial or desirable qualities; insignificant: as, a wishy-washy speech.

Chaucer, Troilus, iii. 1653.

wisp (wisp), n. [< ME. wisp, wysp, wesp, wisp, also wips, an older form (the s being prob. formative); not found in AS.; cf. LG. wiepe, a wisp;
cf. Norw. rippa, something that skips about, a wisp to sprinkle or daub with, a swape, or machine for raising water, etc., = Sw. dial. ripp, an ear of rye, a little sheaf or bundle; cf. Goth.
waips, also wipja, a crown. Wisp has nothing to do with whisk: see whisk.] 1. A handful or small bundle, as of straw or hay; a twisted handful.

A wisp of straw were worth a thousand crowns
To make this shameless culler know herself.

tnus, or will-o'-the-wisp.

or like a wisp along the marsh so damp,
Which leads beholders on a boggy walk,
He flitted to and fro a dancing light,
Which all who saw it follow'd, wrong or right.
Byron, Don Juan, vii. 46.

We did not know the real light, but chased
The wisp that flickers where no foot can tread.
Tennyson, Princess, iv.

4. A disease in cattle, consisting in inflammation and suppuration of the interdigital tissues, most commonly of the hind feet. It may be due to the irritation of dirt, to overgrowth of the hoof, or other causes. Also called foot in the foot. Also wisp.

To cure a Ballock that hath the Wisp (that is lame between the Cheels). Aubrey, Misc., p. 138.

5. In falconry, a flight or walk of snipe. = Syn.
5. Corey, etc. See flock.

Whitsunday.

wistl, Preterit of witl.

wist (wist), v. A spurious word, improperly used as present indicative (wists) of witl.
[Rare.]

But though he wists not of this, he is moved like the great German poet.

Buckle, Essays (Progress of Knowledge), p. 195.

Wistaria (wis-tā'ri-i), n. [NL. (Nuttall, 1818), named in honor of Caspar Wistar, an American anatomist (1761–1818).] 1. A genus of leguminous plants, of the tribe Galegeæ and subtribe Tephrosiæ. It is characterized by having papilionae-ous flowers in terminal racemes, with a smooth style and stamens usually completely diadelphous, and by a coniacones readily dehiscent legume, the last character separating it from the large tropical Old World genus Millettia.
There are 2 or 3 species, natives of North America, China, and Japan. They are lofty climbing shrubs with odd-pi-nate leaves, entire feather-veined and reticulated leaflets, and small stipules. The handsome purplish flowers from terminal pendent racemes. They are much cultivated in America, commonly under the generic name (sometimes erroneously Wisteria); in England they are often known as kidney-bean tree, in Australia as grape flower vine. W.
Chinensis, the Chinese, and W. frutescens, the American wistaria, are much used in the United States to cover ve-randas and walls. The latter is a native of swamp-margins from Virginia to Illinois and southward, and develops its flowers at the same time with the leaves, instead of before them, as in W. Chinensis. W. Japonica, by some thought not a distinct species, is commonly trained in Japan horizonally on trellises over pleasure-seats as an ornamental shade; it sometimes lives more than a century.

2. [l. c.] A plant of this genus.

wistful (wist'fūl), a. [Prob. for whistful, based on the older adverb wistly, which is prob. for whistly. The assumption that wistful stands for wishful is untenable; for the required change wishful > wistful could not occur in the mod. E. period, particularly with wishful itself remaining in use; but the sense 'longing' appears to have arisen in part from association with wishful. It is to be noted that wistful in the earliest instance quoted (Browne) does not mean, as some dictionaries give it, merely 'observant' or 'attentive,' and that its later uses are more or less indefinite, indicating that it was orig. a poetical word, based on some other, which other is prob. wistly for whistly as here assumed.] 1. Silent; hushed; standing in mute attention.

In sullen mutt'rings chide
The artless songsters, and their musick still Should charm the sweet dale and the wistful hill.
W. Browne, Britannia's Pastorals, ii. 2.

This commanding creature . . . put on such a resignation in her countenance, and bore the whispers of all around the court with such a pretty meanness, . . . until she was perfectly confused by meeting something so wistful in all she encountered. Steele, Spectator, No. 113.

2. Full of thoughts; contemplative; musing;
pensive.

Why, Grubbinol, dost thou so wistful seem?
There's sorrow in thy look.
Gay, Shepherd's Week, Friday.

3. Wishful; longing.

Lifting up one of my sashes, [I] cast many a wistful, melancholy look towards the sea.
Swift, Gulliver's Travels, ii. 8.

No poet has expressed more vividly than Shelley the wistful eagerness of the human spirit to interpret the riddle of the universe. E. Dowden, Shelley, l. 75.

wistfully (wist'fū-l), adv. In a wistful manner; pensively; earnestly; longingly; wishfully.

With that, he fell again to pray
Through perspective more wistfully.
S. Butler, Hudibras II. iii. 458.

The captive's miserable solace of gazing wistfully upon the world from which he is excluded.
Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 112.

Doubtless there is nothing sinful in gazing wistfully at the marvellous providences of God's moral governance, and wishing to understand them.
J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, i. 204.

wistfulness (wist'fū-l-nēs), n. The state or property of being wistful.

wistless (wist'les), a. [Irreg. < wist, known:
see wit. Cf. wistful and -less.] Not knowing; ignorant (of); unwitting (of). [Rare.]

Wistless what I did, half from the sheath Drew its glittering blade. Southey, Joan of Arc, i.

wistly (wist'li), adv. [Prob. for whistly, i. e.
'silently,' which sense suits the earliest quotations (cf. "And her eyes on all my motions with a mute observance hung," Tennyson, Locksley Hall); the change of hw to w is very common in England, and may well have been assisted in this instance by association with wist, pret. of wit, and with wish; but to derive wistly from either wist or wish (as if for wishedly) is contrary to sound theory and to the actual use of the word. Wistly in the "Mir. for Mags.," given as the "same as wistly," may be truly wistly, < wist
+ -ly. The same considerations apply to wistful, which appears to stand for whistful.]
1. Silently; with mute attention; earnestly.

Robyn behelde our comly kynge
Wistly in the face.
Lytle Geste of Robyn Hode (Child's Ballads, V. 115).

Speaking it, he wistly look'd on me:
As who should say, "I would thou wert the man
That would divorce this terror from my heart."
Shak., Rich. II., v. 4. 7.

For I'll go turn my tub against the sun,
And wistly mark how higher planets run,
Contemplating their hidden motion.
Martson, Satires, v. 171.

wistonwish (wis'ton-wish), n. Same as wish-tonwish. Godman; Cous and Allen.

wit (wit), v. Pres. ind. 1st pers. wit, 2d pers.
wost (erroneously wotst, wadst), 3d pers. wat (erroneously wotth), pl. wit, pret. wist, pp.
wist (or witen). [A preterit-present verb whose forms have been much confused and misused in mod. E., in which, except in the set phrase to wit, it is now used only archaically; early mod. E. also wet, wet, < ME. witen, wita (pres.

ridst) = Goth. witan (pres. wait, pret. wissa, pp. not found), know; the inf. witan, with short vowel, and sense 'know,' being a later form and sense, developed from the pret. and subj.
of witan, pret. wat, see the present wat, know, being orig. this pret. wat, saw. 'I have seen'

If you examine the sayings of Charles Lamb, Sydney Smith, and other great wits, you will perceive that what amuses you is the sudden perception of some fine resemblance.

J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 145.

wit² (wit), v. i. [*< wit*², n.] To play the wit; be witty; with an indefinite it.

Barton doth pretend to wit it in his palpit-libell.

Hoglin, Life of Land, p. 200. (Darvies.)

wit³. See *wit*².

witan (wī'tan), n. pl. [AS., pl. of wita (ME. wite, wecote, werte), a man of knowledge, member of a council or parliament: see *wit*².] In Anglo-Saxon hist., members of the witenagemot.

As witan from every quarter of the land stood about his throne, men realized how the King of Wessex had risen into the King of England.

J. R. Green, Conq. of Eng., p. 215.

Thou art the mightiest voice in England, man;

Thy voice will lead the Witan.

Tennyson, Harold, ii. 2.

witch¹ (wich), n. [< ME. witche, wieche, wicheche, wiche, a witch (man or woman); < AS. wicca, m., wicce, f. (pl. wiccian in both genders), a sorcerer or sorceress, a wizard or witch, = Fries. wikke = I.G. wikke, a witch; cf. lecl. ritki, m., a witch, wizard, prob. after AS.; prob. a reduction, with shortened vowel and assimilation of consonants (tg > tk > kk, in AS. written cc), of AS. witga, a synecopated form of witiga, witiga, a seer, prophet, soothsayer, magician (cf. deafal-witga, 'devil prophet,' wizard) (= OHG. wizago, wizago, a prophet, soothsayer), *< witig, seeing, a form parallel to witig (with short vowel), knowing, witan, know, witan*, see: see *wit*¹, and cf. witly. The notion that witch is a fem. form is usually accompanied by the notion that the corresponding masc. is wizard (the two words forming one of the pairs of masc. and fem. correlatives given in the grammars); but witch is historically masc., as well as fem. (being indeed orig., in the AS. form witga, only masc.), and wizard has no immediate relation to witch.

Cf. wiscare, ult. < OHG. wizago, and so a doublet of witch. Hence ult. (< AS. wicca) ME. wikke, wicke, evil, wicked, and wikked, wicked, wicked; see *wick*² and *wicked*¹. The change of form (AS. wicca < witga) is paralleled by a similar change in orchard (AS. orced < oreward < ortgeard), and the development of sense ('wicked,' 'wicked') is in keeping with the history of other words which have become ultimately associated with popular superstitions—superstition, whether religious or etymological, tending to pervert or distort the forms and meanings of words.] 1. A person (of either sex) given to the black art: a sorcerer; a conjurer; a wizard; later and more particularly, a woman supposed to have formed a compact with the devil or with evil spirits, and to be able by their aid to operate supernaturally; one who practises sorcery or enchantment; a sorceress.

"Crucifige," quod a caecapelle. "I warante hym a witche!"

Piers Plowman (B), xviii. 46.

There was a man in that citee, whos name was Symount, a witche.

Wyclif, Acts viii. 9.

Devil or devil's dam, I'll conjure thee;

Blood will I draw on thee; thou art a witch.

Shak., 1 Hen. VI., i. 5. 6.

When a Country-wench cannot get her Butter to come, she says, The Witch is in her Churn.

Selden, Table-Talk, p. 82.

2. An old, ugly, and crabbed or malignant woman: a hag; a crone; a term of abuse.

Foul wrinkled witch, what maketh thou in my sight?

Shak., Rich. III., i. 3. 164.

3. A fascinating woman; a woman, especially a young woman or a girl, possessed of peculiar attractions, whether of beauty or of manners; a bewitching or charming young woman or girl. [Colloq.]—4. A charm or spell. [Rare.]

If a man but dally by her feet,

He thinks it straight a witch to charm his daughter.

Greene, George-a-Greene, p. 262. (Darvies.)

5. A petrel: doubtless so called from its incessant flight, often kept up in the dark.—6. A water-witch.—7. The pole, pole-dab, or craig-fluke, a kind of flatfish.—Black witch. And, like white-witches, mischievously good.

Dryden, The Medal, l. 62.

Witches' Sabbath. See Sabbath, 5.—Witch of Agnesi, in math. a plane curve discussed by Donna Maria Gaetana Agnesi, professor of mathematics in the University of Bologna, who died a nun in 1790. It consists of a straight line together with a cubic to which that line is the inflectional asymptote, this cubic having an anode at infinity in a direction perpendicular to the line. If $x = 0$ is the equation of the line, $(y/x)^2 + 1 = (x/z)^2$ is that of the cubic. The area of the curve is four times that of the circle having four-point contact with the cubic and two-point contact with the line. Also called versiera.

witch¹ (wich), v. t. [< ME. witchen, wiechen, wichen, < AS. wiccian, bewitch; cf. D. LG. wikken = lecl. ritka, soothsay, divine; from the noun. (cf. bewitch.)] 1. To bewitch; fascinate; enchant.

The practices of witches; sorcery: a supernatural power which persons were formerly supposed to obtain by entering into compact with the devil. The belief in witchcraft was common in Europe till the sixteenth century, and maintained its ground with tolerable firmness till the middle of the seventeenth century; indeed it is not altogether extinct even at the present day. Numbers of reputed witches were formerly condemned to be burned. One conspicuous outbreak of popular excitement over supposed demoniacal manifestations took place about 1692 in New England, especially in and near Salem.

There was thane an Enchantour in the Contree, that deled with Wyeche craft, that men clepen Takuia.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 132.

Now the arrival of Sir William Phips to the government of New-England was at a time when . . . scores of poor people had newly fallen under a prodigious possession of devils, which it was then generally thought had been by witchcrafts introduced. C. Mather, Mag. Christ., ii. 13.

2. Extraordinary power; irresistible influence; fascination; witchery.

You have witchcraft in your lips, Kate.

Shak., 1 Hen. V., v. 2. 301.

witch-elm (wich'elm), n. [Also wich-elm, and archaically wych-elm; also wiech-elm; *< witch*² + elm. In this word and witch-hazel, the archaic spelling is much affected in modern use.] An elm, Ulmus montana, of hilly districts in western and northern Europe and northern Asia; the common wild elm of Scotland, Ireland, and the northern and western parts of England. It is less tall than the common English elm (U. campestris), but is a considerable tree, of picturesque habit, the trunk branching naturally near the base, the leaves broadly ovate. The wood has the fine-grained, tough, and elastic quality of U. campestris, and is preferred for bent work, as in boat-building. In southeastern England a variety of the common elm is also called by this name.

The witch-elm that shades Saint Fillan's Spring.

1. The witch- or wych-elm, Ulmus montana, its broad leaves resembling those of hazel. [Prov. Eng.]—2. A shrub or small tree, Hamamelis Virginiana, of eastern North America. It is noticeable for its flowers with four yellow strap-shaped petals, appearing when the leaves are falling, the fruit, which is a woody capsule, ripening the next season. The leaves Branch with Fruits of Witch-hazel—Hamamelis Virginiana.

a, male flower; b, fruit.

are broad and straight-veined, wavy-margined. The leaves and bark of witch hazel abound in tannin, and the bark affords also a reputed sedative application for various cases of external inflammation. The leaves are said to possess similar properties, and an infusion of them is given internally for bowel-complaints and hemorrhages. While witch-hazel is now much in vogue as a cure for bruises and sprains, as also for various internal difficulties, and is even officially recognized, its real virtue, if any, is still quite in doubt.

witenagemot (wit'e-na-ge-mōt'), n. [AS. witan-gemōt, 'counselors' moot'; witan, gen. pl. of wita, wota, gewita; a man of knowledge, a counselor; gemot, moot or meet, assembly, council, parliament; see *wit*² and *moot*¹.] In Anglo-Saxon hist., the great national council or parliament, consisting of the king with his dependents and friends and sometimes the members of his family, the ealdormen, the bishops, and other ecclesiastics. This council, which met frequently, constituted the highest court of judicature in the kingdom. It was summoned by the king in any political emergency, and its concurrence was necessary in many important measures, such as the deciding of war, the levying of extraordinary taxes, grants of land in certain cases, election and (in many instances) deposition of kings.

The old Germanic tradition, which associated "the wise men" in all royal action, gave a constitutional ground to the powers which the Witenagemot exercised more and more as English society took a more and more aristocratic form; and it thus came to share with the crown in the higher justice, in the imposition of taxes, the making of laws, the conclusion of treaties, the control of war, the disposal of public lands, the appointment of bishops and great officers of state. There were times when it claimed even to elect or depose a king.

What woeful stuff this madrigal would be!

Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 418.

= Syn. 2. Mournful, calamitous, disastrous, afflictive, miserable, grievous. See woe.

woefully, wofully (wō'fūl-i), adv. In a woeful manner.

Which now among you, who lament so woefully, . . . has suffered as he suffered? V. Knox, Works, VI., serm. v.

It is a fact of which many seem woefully ignorant.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 484.

woefulness, wofulness (wō'fūl-nes), n. [< ME. wofulnesse; < woful + -ness.] The state or quality of being woeful; misery; calamity.

This day can nought be said the heaviness mad, Nought half the wofulness the cite having.

Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 648.

The lamenting Elegiac . . . sorely is to be prayed, either for compassionate accompanying just causes of lamentation, or for rightly paying out how weak be the passions of wofulness.

Sir P. Sidney, Apol. for Poetrie, p. 44.

woesome (wō'sum), a. [See. woesome; < woe + -some.] Woeful; sad; mournful.

woe-wearied (wō'wēr'id), a. Worn out with woe or grief. [Rare.]

My woe-wearied tongue is mute and dumb.

Shak., Rich. III., iv. 4. 18.

woe-weary, a. [ME. wo-werie; < woe + weary.] Sad at heart.

Wo-werie and wetschod wente ich forth after,
As a recheles renke that recheeth nat of sorwe.

Piers Plowman (C), xxi. 1.

woe-worn (wō'wörn), a. Worn or marked by woe or grief.

In lively mood he spoke, to wile

From Wilfrid's woe-worn cheek a smile.

Scott, Rob Roy, v. 14.

woful, wofully, etc. See woeful, etc.

woiwode, wojwoda (wōi'wōd, wōi-wō'dä), n. Same as voivode.

woke¹, n. A Middle English form of *week*¹.

woke² (wōk), n. Preterit and past participle of *wake*¹.

wokent, v. A Middle English form of weaken.

wokus (wō'kus), n. [N. Amer. Ind.] A coarse meal made by the Indians of the northwest from the seeds of Nymphaea (Nuphar) polysepalum, the yellow pond-lily of that region. See pond-lily, 1.

Old Chaloquin carried his bag of wokus for food. This is the roasted and ground seeds of the yellow water-lily, and looks something like cracked wheat.

Amer. Nat., Nov., 1889, p. 971.

wol¹, v. An obsolete or dialectal form of *wilt*¹.

wol², adv. An obsolete or dialectal form of *well*².

wold¹ (wōld), n. [Formerly also would; also dial. old; < ME. wold, wald, wald, < AS. weald, wald, a wood, forest, = OS. OFries. wald = D. woud = OHG. wald, MHG. walt, G. wald, a wood, forest (> OF. gaut, brushwood?), = leel. vōlr (gen. vallar for valdar), a field, plain; perhaps orig. a hunting-ground, considered as 'a possession,' and so connected with AS. gewald (= G. gewalt = leel. vald), power, dominion, < wealdan, etc., rule, possess: see wield. Cf. Gr. αἰός (for FaitFog*?), a grove. Cf. weld.] An open tract of country; a down. The wolds of Yorkshire and Lincolnshire are high, rolling districts bare of woods, and exactly similar, both topographically and geologically, to the downs of the more southern parts of England. The Cotswold Hills, in Gloucestershire, closely resemble the downs of Kent and Sussex and the wolds of Yorkshire and Lincolnshire in every respect except the geological age of the formations by which they are underlain, which, in the case of the Cotswolds, is a calcareous rock of Jurassic, and not of Cretaceous age, as is the case with the other-mentioned wolds and downs.

Who sees not a great difference betwixt . . . the Wolds in Lincolnshire and the Fens? Barton, Anat. of Mel., p. 259.

Each hill and dale, each deepening glen and wold.

Byron, Child Harold, ll. 88.

The notes of the robin and bluebird

Sounded sweet upon wold and in wood.

Longfellow, Evangeline, ll. 4.

The wolds [of Yorkshire] constitute properly but one region, sloping from a curved summit, whose extremities touch the sea at Flamborough Head, and the Humber at Ferryby; but this crescent of hills is cut through by one continuous hollow,—the great Wold Valley from Settrington to Bridlington.

Phillips, Yorkshire, p. 41.

wold², n. See *weld*¹.

wold³, woldet. Obsolete forms of would. See *will*¹.

woldestowt. A Middle English form of wouldst thou.

wolf (wūlf), n.; pl. wolves (wūlvz). [< ME. wolf, wulf, wlf, wlf (pl. wolves, wulfes, wolvcs, wulfcs), complimentary term for a warrior, is a constituent of many E. and G. names, as in Adolph, 'noble-wolf,' Rudolph, 'glory-wolf,' etc. Cf. werwolf, lupine, lycanthropy, etc.] 1. A digitigrade carnivorous canid quadruped, Canis lupus, of the lupine or thooid series of Canidae;

hence, some similar animal. The common wolf of Europe, etc., is yellowish or fulvous-gray, with harsh strong hair, erect pointed ears, and the tail straight or nearly so. The height at the shoulder is from 27 to 29 inches. Wolves are swift of foot, crafty, and rapacious, and destructive enemies to the sheep-cote and farm-yard; they associate in packs to hunt the larger quadrupeds, as the deer, the elk, etc. When hard pressed with hunger these packs not infrequently attack isolated travelers, and have been known even to enter villages and carry off children. In general, however, wolves are cowardly and stealthy, approaching sheepfolds and farm-buildings only at dead of night, making a rapid retreat if in the least disturbed by a dog or a man, and exhibiting great cunning in the avoidance of traps. Wolves are still numerous in some parts of Europe, as France, Hungary, Spain, Turkey, and Russia; they probably ceased to exist in England about the end of the fifteenth century, and in Scotland in the first part of the eighteenth century; the latter date probably marks also the disappearance of wolves in Ireland. The wolves of North America are of two very distinct species. One of these is scarcely different from the European, but is generally regarded as a variety, under the name of C. l. occidentalis. The usual color is a grizzled gray, but it sports in many colors, as reddish and blackish. Most strains of the American wolf are larger and stouter than those of Europe. The gray wolf is also called the buffalo-wolf, from its former abundance in the buffalo-range, and timber-wolf, as distinguished from the prairie-wolf or coyote, Canis latrans, a much smaller and very different animal, which lives chiefly in open country, in burrows in the ground, and in some respects resembles the jackal. (See coyote, with ent.) Yet other wolves, of rather numerous species, inhabit most parts of the world; some grade into jackals (see Thomomys), others toward foxes (see fox-wolf); and most of them interbreed easily with some varieties of the dog of the countries they respectively inhabit, the dog itself being a composite of a mixed wolf ancestry (see wolf-dog, 2).

2. A person noted for ravenousness, cruelty, cunning, or the like: used in opprobrium.

Rescued is Orleans from the English wolves.

Shak., 1 Hen. VI. (ed. Knight), i. 6. 2.

3. In entom.: (a) A small naked caterpillar, the larva of Tinea granella, the wolf-moth, which infests granaries. (b) The larva of a bot-fly; a warble.—4. A tuberculous excrescence which rapidly eats away the flesh. See *lupus*¹, 3.

A tree that enreth the wold with the shavings of the wood growth in these parts. Hakluyt's Voyages, l. 361.

If God should send a cancer upon thy face, or a wolf into thy side, if he should spread a crust of leprosy upon thy skin, what wouldst thou give to be but as now thou art?

Jer. Taylor, Holy Living, ll. 6.

5. In music: (a) The harsh discord heard in certain chords of keyboard-instruments, especially the organ, when tuned on some system of unequal temperament. In the mean-tone system, as usually applied, five intervals in each octave were discordant—namely, G₂-F₃, B₂-E₃, F₂-B₂, C₂-F₃, and G₂-C₃. Under the modern system of equal temperament, the wolf is evenly distributed, and so practically unnoticed. (b) A chord or interval in which such a discord appears. (c) In instruments of the viol class, a discordant or false vibration in a string when stopped at a certain point, usually due to a defect in the structure or adjustment of the instrument. Sometimes called wolf-note.—6.

A wooden fence placed across a ditch in the corner of a field, to prevent cattle from straying into another field by means of the ditch.

Hallivell. [Local, Eng.]—7. Same as *willow*².

E. H. Knight.—Barking wolf, the coyote or prairie-wolf of North America, Canis latrans. See cut under coyote.—Black wolf, a melanistic variety of the common wolf, found in southern parts of the United States.—Dark as a wolf's mouth or throat, pitch-dark.

—Golden wolf, the Tibetan wolf, Canis himalayensis. Also called chance.—Gray wolf. See def. 1.—Indian wolf, a certain Asiatic wolf, Canis pallipes, somewhat like a jackal.—Marine wolf, in her. See marine.—Pied wolf. See pied.—Red wolf, a reddish or erythritic variety of the common wolf, found in the United States.—Strand wolf. See cut under thylacine.—To cry wolf, to raise a false alarm; in allusion to the shepherd boy in a well-known fable.—To have a wolf by the ears, to have a difficult task.

He found himself so intrigued that it was like a wolf by the ears; he could neither hold it nor let it go; and, for certain, it bit him at last.

Roger North, Lord Guilford, II. 2. (Darvies.)

To have a wolf in the stomach, to eat ravenously. Hallivell.—To keep the wolf from the door, to keep out hunger or want.—To see a wolf, to lose one's voice: in allusion to the belief of the ancients (see Virgil, Eccl. ix.) that if a man saw a wolf before the wolf saw him he lost his voice, at least for a time.

"What! are you mute?" I said—a wagfish guest. "Perhaps she's seen a wolf," rejoined in jest.

Faucher, tr. of Idylls of Theocritus, xiv.

"Our young companion has seen a wolf," said Lady Hamelin, alluding to an ancient superstition, "and has lost his tongue in consequence."

Scott, Quentin Durward, xviii.

White wolf, a whitish variety of the common wolf of North America.—Zebra wolf. See zebra-wolf. (See also prairie-wolf, timber-wolf.)

wolf (wūlf), v. [< wulf, n.] I. intrans. To hunt for wolves.

The stock in trade of a party engaged in wolfing consists in flour, bacon, and strychnine, the first two articles named for their own consumption, the last for the wolves.

Sportsman's Gazetteer, p. 13.

II. trans. To devour ravenously: as, to wolf down food. [Slang.] wolfberry (wūlf'ber'i), n.; pl. wolfberries (-iz). A shrub, Symphoricarpos occidentalis, of northern North America, in the United States ranging from Michigan and Illinois to the Rocky Mountains. It is sometimes cultivated for ornament, mainly on account of its white berries, which are borne in axillary and terminal spikes.

wolf-dog (wūlf'dog), n. 1. A large stout dog of no particular variety, kept to guard sheep, cattle, etc., and destroy wolves.—2. A dog-bred, or supposed to be bred, between a dog and a wolf. Such hybrids are of constant occurrence among the dogs kept by North American Indians; and instances of the reversion of the dog to the feral state in western North America are recorded.

wolf-eel (wūlf'el), n. The wolf-fish.

Wolfenbüttel fragments. See fragment.

wolfer (wūlf'ēr), n. [< wulf + -er.] One who hunts wolves; a professional wolf-killer.

The wild throng of buffalo-hunters, wolfers, teamsters, . . . filled the streets. The Century, XXXV. 416.

Wolfe's operation for ectropium. See operation.

Wolffia (wūlf'i-ā), n. [NL. (Horkel, 1839), named after N. M. von Wolff (1724-84), a German physician.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants, of the order Lemnaceae, distinguished from Lemna, the other genus, by one-celled anthers and by the absence of roots. The 12 species are chiefly tropical, occurring in Europe, India, Africa, and America, and extending north into the United States; they are commonly globose, sometimes conical or flattish, with a profliferous base, and produce minute flowers from chinks in the surface, each flower consisting of a single stamen or ovary without any spathe or other envelope. They are known, like Lemna, as duckweed, and are remarkable for their almost microscopic size, being esteemed the smallest of flowering plants.

Wolffian¹ (wūlf'i-an), a. Same as *Wolfian*¹.

Wolffian² (wūlf'i-an), a. [< K. F. Wolff (see def.) + -ian.] Of or pertaining to K. F. Wolff (1733-94), a German anatomist and physiologist; in anat., physiol., and zool., noting certain structures of vertebrate animals.—Wolffian bodies, the primordial kidneys or renal organs in all vertebrates, excepting probably the lancelets; the so-called false kidneys, in all the higher vertebrates (Mammalia and Synbranchia) preceding and performing the function of true kidneys until replaced by the latter, but among Ichthyopsida, as fishes, persisting and constituting the permanent renal organs.—Wolffian ducts. See ductus Wolffii, under ductus.

wolf-fish (wūlf'fish), n. A teleostean acanthopterygious fish, Anarrhichas lupus; so called from its ferocious aspect and habits. It is found around the coasts of Great Britain, where it attains a length of 6 or 7 feet, but in southern seas it is said to reach a much greater size. The mouth is armed with strong sharp teeth, the inner series forming blunt grinders adapted for crushing the mollusks and crustaceans on which it feeds. The ventral fins are absent; the color is brownish-gray, spotted and striped with brown over the upper parts, while the belly is white. The flesh is palatable, and is largely eaten in Iceland, while the skin is durable, and is manufactured into a kind of shagreen. When taken in a net it attacks its captors ferociously, and unless stunned by a blow on the head is capable of doing great damage with its powerful teeth. Also called sea-cat, catfish, wolf-eel, and sea-wolf. See cut under Anarrhichas.

Wolfian¹ (wŭl'fī-an), n. [< C. Wolff (see def.) + -ian.] Pertaining to the philosophy of Christian Wolff (1679-1754), which is Leibnitzianism diluted with common sense and dressed as a modified scholasticism, more systematic and more Euclidean than that of the middle ages. Though not profound, Wolff's philosophy met the wants of Germany, which it dominated for about fifty years, beginning with 1724. Also Wolfian.

Wolfian² (wŭl'fī-an), n. [< F. A. Wolf (see def.) + -ian.] Pertaining to or promulgated by F. A. Wolf, a German philologist (1759-1824).—Wolfian theory, a theory put forward by Wolf in his "Prolegomena" in 1796, to the effect that the Iliad and Odyssey cannot be the works of one man, Homer, because writing was unknown at the time that these poems are said to have been composed. He supposes, therefore, that the Iliad and Odyssey consist of ballads or episodes, the work of different men, collected and arranged in a more or less consistent and homogeneous whole in the sixth century B. C. The ballads could have been preserved by the recitation of strolling minstrels.

Wolfianism (wŭl'fī-an-izm), n. [*< Wolfian*¹ + -ism.] The system of Wolfian philosophy. See *Wolfian*¹.

wolfing (wŭl'fing), n. [Verbal n. of wolf, v.] The occupation or industry of taking wolves for their pelts. Wolfing is extensively practised in winter in some parts of the United States, as Montana and the Dakotas. The wolves are destroyed chiefly by poisoning with strychnine.

wolfish (wŭl'fish), a. [Formerly also woltrish; < wolf + -ish.] 1. Like a wolf; having the qualities or traits of a wolf; savage; ravening; as, a wolfish visage; wolfish designs.

Thy desires
Are woltrish, bloody, starved, and ravenous.
Shak., M. of V., iv. 1. 138.

Bane to thy wolfish nature! B. Jonson, Volpone, v. 8.
Good master, let it warn you; though we have hitherto pass'd by these man-Tygers, these woltrish outlaws safely, early and late, as not worth their malice.
Brome, Queen's Exchange, ii.

2. Hungry as a wolf is supposed to be; ravenous. [Colloq.]

wolfishly (wŭl'fish-li), adv. In a wolfish manner.
wolfkin (wŭl'kin), n. [< wolf + -kin.] A young or small wolf.

"Was this your instructions, wolfkin?" (for she called me lambkin).
Richardson, Pamela, i. 144.

Kite and kestrel, wolf and wolfkin.
Tennyson, Boadicea.

wolfing (wŭl'fing), n. [< wolf + -ing.] A young wolf; a wolfkin.

Young children were thrown in, their mothers vainly pleading: "Wolflings," answered the Company of Marat,
"who would grow to be wolves."

Carlyle, French Rev., III. v. 3.

wolf-moth (wŭl'fōth), n. A cosmopolitan grain-pest, Tineæ granella, a small creamy-white moth with brown spots on the wings, whose small white larva infest stored grain. See wolf, n., 3 (a), and cut under corn-moth.

wolf-net (wŭl'net), n. A kind of net used in fishing, by means of which great numbers of fish are taken.

wolf-note (wŭl'not), n. Same as wolf, 5 (c).

wolftram (wŭl'fram), n. [< w. wolfram, given as "wolf, wolf, + ram, rahm, froth, cream, soot."]

1. A native tungstate of iron and manganese. Its color is generally a brownish or grayish black, and it has a reddish-brown streak. The specific gravity (7.2 to 7.3) is nearly equal to that of metallic iron. It occurs crystallized, also massive with lamellar structure; it is the ore from which the metal tungsten is usually obtained, and is often found associated with tinstone. Also called wolframb.

2. The metal tungsten or wolframium: an improper and now uncommon use.—Wolfram-ocher. Same as tungstite.

wolframite (wŭl'fra-mā't), n. Same as tungstite.

wolframie (wŭl'ram'īk), a. Of or pertaining to tungsten.

wolframium (wŭl'ram'ū-m), n. Same as tungsten, the chemical symbol of which is W, from this word.

wolfrobe (wŭl'rōb), n. The skin or pelt of a wolf made into a robe for use in carriages, etc.

wolf's-bane (wŭl's'bān), n. [< wolf's, poss. of wolf, + bane.] A plant of the genus Aconitum; aconite or monk's-hood; specifically, 1. Lycostictum, the yellow or yellow-flowered wolf's-bane, also called badger's, beard's, or hare's-bane. It is found widely in Europe, especially in mountains. Its greenish-yellow flowers have the hood developed like an extinguisher; its poison is less virulent than that of other species.—Mountain wolf's-bane. See Ranunculus.

wolfsbergite (wŭlfs'bērg-it), n. [Named from Wolfsberg, in the Harz.] Same as chalcostibite.

wolf-scalp (wŭl'skāl), n. The skin of a wolf's head, or a piece of it sufficient for identification, exhibited to claim the bounty paid for the killing of a wolf in some parts of the United States.

wolf's-claws (wŭlfs'klāz), n. The common club-moss, Lycopodium clavatum: so called from the claw-like ends of the prostrate branches.

wolf's-fist (wŭlfs'fist), n. [< ME. wulfes fist, < AS. wulfes fist, a puffball; wulfes, gen. of wulf, wolf; fist, ME. fyst, a breaking of wind: see wolf and fist. Cf. Lycopodium.] A puffball. See Lycopodium. Gerard. Also wolfst.

wolf's-foot (wŭlfs'fūt), n. The club-moss, Lycopodium: so named by translation of the generic name.

wolf's-head (wŭlfs'hēd), n. [< ME. wolresheed; < wolf's, poss. of wolf, + head.] 1. The head of a wolf.—2*t*. An outlaw.

Tho were his bondemen sory and nothing glad,
When Gamelyn her lord wolres-heed was cryed and maad.
Tale of Gamelyn, l. 700.

wolfskin (wŭlfs'skīn), n. [< ME. wolreskyne; < wolf's, poss. of wolf, + skin.] The skin or pelt of a wolf; also, a rug or other article made of this pelt; a wolfrobe.

wolf's-milk (wŭlfs'mīlk), n. A plant of the genus Euphorbia, particularly E. Helioscopia, the sun-spurge. The name is supposed to refer to the acrid milky juice of these plants.

wolf-spider (wŭlfs'pī'dēr), n. Any spider of the family Lycosidae, the species of which do not lie in wait, but prowl about after their prey and spring upon it; a tarantula. See Lycosidae, and cut under tarantula, 1.

wolf's-thistle (wŭlfs'this'1), n. See thistle.

wolf-tooth (wŭl'tōth), n.; pl. wolf-teeth (-tēth). A small supernumerary premolar of the horse, situated in advance of the grinders. There are sometimes four of these teeth, one on each side of each jaw.

Many readers may not be aware that blind horses, even in one eye only, will not get a proper summer coat; and the connexion between wolf-teeth and shying is another of many interesting facts. Athenaeum, No. 3300, p. 120.

wolf-trap (wŭl'trap), n. In her., a bearing representing a curved bar having a ring fixed to the center of it. Berry.

woll, v. An obsolete or dialectal form of will.
Wollaston doublet. See doublet, 2 (b).

wollastonite (wŭl's-tōn-īt), n. [Named after W. H. Wollaston (1766-1828), an English scientist, the discoverer of the method of working native platinum.] A mineral occurring in tabular crystals (hence called tabular spar), also massive, cleavable, with fibrous structure. It has a white to yellow or gray color, and a vitreous to pearly cleavage. It is a silicate of calcium (CaSiO₃), and belongs to the pyroxene group.

Wollaston prism. The four-sided glass prism of the camera lucida devised by Wollaston in 1804. See figure under camera lucida.

wolle, v. See will.

wolle², wollent. Obsolete forms of wool, woolen.
wollongongite (wŭl'on-gōng-īt), n. A kind of kerogen-shale, very rich in oil, found near Wollongong in New South Wales; it was originally described as a kind of hydrocarbon.

wolloper, n. See *walloper*².

woltowt. A Middle English form of wolt (wilt) thou.

wolveboon (wŭlv'bōn), n. See Toxicodendron.
wolverene, wolverine (wŭl-vè-rēn'), n. [Formerly also wolveren, wolverenne, wolverin, wolvering; appar. a French-Canadian name based on E. wolf.] The American glutton, or carcajon, Gulo luscus (specifically identical with the glutton of the Old World), a subplantigrade carnivorous mammal of the family Mustelidae, inhabiting British America and northerly or mountainous regions of the United States. It is 2 or 3 feet long, of thick set form, with short, stout legs, low ears, subplantigrade feet, bushy tail and shaggy pelage of Wolverene or Carcajon (Gulo luscus).

blackish color, with a lighter band of color on each side meeting its fellow upon the rump. The animal is noted for its voracity, ferocity, and sagacity. In the fur countries, where the wolverene is numerous, it is one of the most serious obstacles with which the trapper has to contend, as it soon learns to spring the traps set for ermine and sable, and devour the bait without getting caught, being itself too wary to be trapped without great difficulty. In these regions, also, caches of provisions must be constructed with special precautions against their discovery and spoliation by wolverenes. The pelt is valuable, and is much used for robes and mats, in which the whitish or light-brown areas of the fur present a set of oval or horse-shoe-shaped figures when several skins are sewed together. From its comparatively large and very stout form, together with its special coloration, the wolverene is sometimes called skunk-bear.—The Wolverine State, Michigan.

wolves, n. Plural of wolf.

wolves'-thistle (wŭlvz'this'1), n. See thistle.

wolvish (wŭl'vish), a. An obsolete form of wolfish.

woward, adv. See wooward.

woman (wŭm'an), n.; pl. women (wim'en). [< ME. woman, wumman, womman, wumman, wummon, altered (with the common change of wi- to ui-, often spelled wo-) from wimman, wimmon, which stand (with assimilation of fm to mm) for the earlier wifman, wifmon, wyfmān (pl. women, wummen*, wommen, wummen, wimmen, earlier wifmen, wyfmēn), < AS. wifman, wifmon, later wimman (pl. wifmen, later wimmen), a woman, lit. 'wife-man', i. e. female person. < wif, a woman, female, + man, man, person (masc., but used, like L. homo and Gr. άνθρωπος, in the general sense 'person, human being'). The compound wifman is peculiar to AS., but a similar formation appears in the G. weibsperson. It is notable that it was thought necessary to join wif, a neuter noun, representing a female person, to man, a masc. noun, representing either a male or female person, to form a word denoting a female person exclusively. The assimilation of fm to mm occurs likewise in leman, formerly and more prop. spelled lemman, and in Lammus. The change of initial wi- to ui- occurs also in AS. widu > wadu > E. wood.] 1. An adult female of the human race; figuratively, the female sex; human females collectively. See lady, 5.

Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, i.

Wonderful Parliament. Same as Merciless Parliament (which see, under parliament). = Syn. Wonderful, Strange, Surprising, Curious, Unique, extraordinary, marvelous, amazing, startling, wondrous (poetic). Wonderful generally refers to something above the common, and so marvelous, perhaps almost incredible. Strange refers rather to something beside the common — that is, simply very unusual or odd, and so exciting surprise or wonder. Anything that excites awe or high admiration, or strikes one as sublime, is wonderful; an unpleasant object may be strange, but would not be called wonderful. That which is unexpected is surprising, but it is not necessarily strange: as, a surprising fact; a surprising discovery in science. Curious is wonderful on a small scale; by its derivation it often refers to an object extremely nice and intricate or elaborate in its details, but also it often conveys the notion of pleasing strangeness and even of rarity: as, a curious bit of mosaic; a curious piece of mechanism; a curiously colored stone. Unique expresses that which is sole of its kind or quality; as, a unique book; a unique sort of person. See eccentric and surprise.

wonderful (wūn'dēr-fūl), adv. [< ME. wonderful; < wonderful, a.] Wonderfully; exceedingly; very. [Obsolete or vulgar.]

Alas! she comyth wonderfull lightly;
Man seith not the hour ne hou he shall dy.
Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 6159.

Chymistry, I know by a little Experience, is wonderful pleasing.
Hovell, Letters, l. vi. 41.

wonderfully (wūn'dēr-fūl-ly), adv. [< ME. wonderfully; < wonderful + -ly.] 1. In a wonderful manner; in a manner to excite wonder or surprise; surprisingly; strangely; remarkably; in colloquial language often nearly or quite equivalent to 'very': as, wonderfully little difference.

ge schal se him rise vp and speke, and wonderfully be comfortid and strekthid thereby.
Book of Quinte Essence (ed. Furnivall), p. 15.

I will praise thee; for I am fearfully and wonderfully made.
Ps. cxxxix. 14.

2. With wonder or admiration.

wood² (wōd), n. A Scotch form of wool.

wood³, n. and a. An old spelling of wool.

wood¹ (wud), n. [< ME. wode, wude, wod (pl. wodes, wudes), < AS. wudu, orig. widu, a wood, a tree, wood, timber, = MD. MiG. wede, a wood, wood, = OHG. witu, MiG. wite, wood, = Icel. ritir = Sw. Dan. red, a tree, wood; akin to (according to some, derived from) the Celtic words OIr. fíð, Ir. fíodh, a wood, tree (fíodhis, shrubbery, underwood), = Gael. fíodh, a wilderness, wood, timber (fíodhach, shrubs), = W. gwydd, trees (gwyddeli, bushes, bracks).] 1. A large and thick collection of growing trees; a forest; often in the plural, with the same force as the singular.

From Ebron Men gon to Bethelam in half a day; for it is but 5 Myle; and it is fulle fayre Weye, be Fleynes and Wodes fulle delectable. Manderlyle, Travels, p. 69.

Light thickens, and the crow

Makes wing to the rooky wood.

Shak., Macbeth, iii. 2. 51.

There is a pleasure in the pathless woods.

Eyron, Child of Harold, iv. 178.

2. The substance of trees; the hard fibrous substance which composes the body of a tree and its branches, and which lies between the pith and the bark. In dicotyledonous plants the wood is composed externally of the albumen or sap-wood, and internally of the duramen or hard wood. In monocotyledonous plants, or endogens, the hardest part of the wood is nearest the circumference, while the interior is composed of cellular tissue.

3. Timber; the trunks or main stems of trees which attain such dimensions as to be fit for architectural and other purposes. In this sense the word implies not only standing trees suitable for buildings, etc., but also such trees cut into beams, rafters, boards, planks, etc. See timber.

4. Firewood; cordwood.

To-morrow morning bedding and a gown shall be sent in, and wood and coal.

Dekker and Webster, Northward Ho, iv. 4.

5. The cask, keg, or barrel, as distinguished from the bottle; as, wine drawn from the wood.

Ordinary clarets from the wood 48. to 68. per gallon; good bottled clarets from 38. or 48. to 108. a bottle.

Ashton, Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, I. 199.

6. The grain of wood.

Rightlie smolothed and wrought as it should, not ouer- (t)wherlie, and against the wood.

Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 35.

7. In her., three or four trees grouped together, usually represented as rooted in a mound, which is vert. unless otherwise blazoned. Also called hurst.—8. In printing, a wood-block, or wood-blocks collectively, as distinguished from a metallic type or plate of any kind; as, cuts printed from the wood.—9. In music, the wooden wind-instruments of an orchestra taken collectively. See *wind*², n. 5, wind-instrument, and instrument, 3 (h). Also called wood wind.—10. Figuratively, a crowd, mass, or collection.

And though my buckler bare a wood of darts,
Yet left not I, but with audacious face
I brauely fought.

T. Hudson, tr. of Du Bartas's Judith, v.

Names of Tribulation, Persecution,

Restraint, Long-patience, and such like, affected

By the whole family or wood of you.

E. Jonson, Alchemist, iii. 2.

Wood is used to signify any miscellaneous collection, or stock of materials, hence some poets titlle their miscellaneous works sylvium libri; and our poet [Ben Jonson], conforming to this practice, calls his the Forest.

Epton, quoted in note to "The Alchemist."

Agal or agila wood. See andallochum. Agatized wood. See agatized wood.

Alloes wood. See alloes wood.

Amboyna wood. See amboyna wood.—Artificial wood, a composition made of paper, paper pulp, glue, sawdust, hemp albumen and oil, resins, drying-oils, sulphur, caoutchouc, gutta-percha, mineral salts, etc. When warm or wet, according to the nature of the particular composition, it is plastic, but in cooling or drying it hardens and acquires properties similar to those of wood.

Brauna wood. See brauna.—Brazil wood, braziletto wood. See brazil, braziletto.—Castor wood, a name of Mammea elata.

Caviuna wood, a pale tender wood obtained in Brazil from Dalbergia caviuna and perhaps some other trees.

Champ wood, the wood of the champ and the chopak.—Cock of the woods, the caprellid (which see, with cut).—Commissioners of Woods and Forests, a department of the British Government, called more fully the Board of Commissioners of Woods, Forests, Land-revenues, Works, and Buildings, established by 2 and 3 Wm. IV., c. 1. By 14 and 15 Vict., c. 42 it is divided into a Board of Commissioners of Woods, Forests, and Land-revenues, and a Board of Commissioners of Works and Public Buildings. The former have the management of the crown woods and forests, and land-revenues, the latter have the management of the public works and buildings, to which has been added, by later acts, the care of the royal parks, etc. Encege. Dict.—Coromandel wood. Same as calamander-wood.—Cuba wood. Same as justie.—Curana wood, the wood of Leuca allissima. See leuca.—Feast of wood-carrying, one of the annual festivals of the ancient Jews, instituted after the Babylonish captivity. It obtained its name from the practice of the people's bringing wood to the temple on the day of its celebration for the burning of the sacrifices.—Fossil wood. (a) Wood in a fossil state—that is, wood in a state of nature that has undergone various preservative processes and has become fossil. Popularly the term is usually applied to silicified wood—that is, wood in which the substance has been replaced, atom by atom, by silica in such a manner as to retain the exact form and appearance of the original wood. Wood preserved in this manner is exceedingly abundant in various parts of the western United States, especially in the Yellowstone National Park, Wyoming, where it is not rare to find trunks 30 feet in height, and 8 or 10 feet in diameter, standing upright exactly in the positions in which they grew, and so perfectly preserved that every cell, with all its delicate markings, can be as satisfactorily examined as from a living tree. In central Arizona perfectly silicified trunks of trees, 8 feet in diameter and 140 feet long, have been observed. These latter belong to the genus Aracaria, the representative in a fossil state of the genus Aracaria. Fossil wood may also be due to the molecules being displaced by lime or iron, or by various combinations of minerals. Lignite, which represents one of the stages in the formation of coal, is very frequently fossil wood which has lost more or less of its volatile constituents, but still retains its wood-like structure and appearance. The term fossil wood is therefore properly applied to any wood that is so situated in the earth, or has been so acted upon by various minerals, as to be permanently preserved. (b) See fossil cork, under fossil.—Hard wood, the wood of various trees, such as oak, cherry, maple, ebony, ironwood, etc., so called from these woods being relatively very hard, firm, and compact. The quality results from the cells having exceedingly thick walls and being very compactly arranged, with very few or no intercellular spaces or ducts. Trees furnishing wood of this character are usually of slow growth, with narrow annual rings and dense, solid heart-wood. Mahogany, rosewood, and most woods susceptible of a fine polish belong to this class.—Hypernic wood. See hypernic.—Incense wood. See incense-tree.—Jacaranda wood. See palausander.—Jarrool, Jarrahal, kamassi wood. See jarral, etc.—Jasperized wood. Same as silicified wood.—Kanyin wood. Same as gurjun wood. See gurjun.—Karri wood, the timber of Eucalyptus diversicolor, of southwestern Australia. The tree is said to attain exceptionally the height of 400 feet. The timber is useful for ship-planking, masts, wheel-work, railway-ties, etc.—Khow wood. See Olea.—Lemon wood. (a) The wood of the lemon-tree, which is hard, elastic, and fragrant. (b) In South Africa, an evergreen shrub, or a tree 20 or 30 feet high, Psychotria Capensis (Grumelia cynosa), having a hard, tough wood, variously useful.—Lingoo wood. Same as lingo.—Loblolly wood. See loblolly-tree.—Metalization of wood. See metalization.—Molded wood. See mold.—Molompi, mora, myall wood. See molompi, etc.—Myrtle wood, the wood of the Tasmanian beech. See Fagus.—Nephritic wood. See nephritic.—Nicaragua wood, a dye-wood exported from Nicaragua, similar to brazil wood, and derived from the same or another species of Casalpinia; peach-wood.—Padouk wood, the Andaman redwood. See redwood, 2.—Pernambuco wood, true brazil wood.—Perpignan wood, the wood of the European nettle-tree, Celtis australis. See nettle-tree, 1.—Petrified wood. Same as silicified wood.—Picraena wood, the wood of Picraena excelsa. See quassia, 2.—Quassia, quebracho, saj wood. See quassia, etc.—Samaria wood. Same as curana wood.—Sand wood, a leguminous shrub of the Isle of Réunion, doubtfully classed as Bromelia Amorogylon.—Santa Martha wood. Same as peach-wood.—Secondary, speckled, sterile wood. See the adjectives.—Silicified wood. See fossil wood, above, and silicify.—Soft wood, a wood, such as basswood, poplar, tulip, cedar, and white pine, which is relatively soft and easily worked. This character is due to the large and thin-walled cells, including usually numerous ducts. Soft-wooded trees are generally of rapid growth, making thick annual layers.—Tonka-bean wood. Same as scut-wood.—Trincomali wood. See balanillo.—Turanian wood, the wood of the bastard bully-tree, Eumelia retusa, of the West Indies.—Wood-bending machine, a machine or an apparatus for bending wood into shape. Different machines are used, according to the purpose for which the wood is to be used, as for ship-timbers, furniture, sleigh-runners, hoops, and staves. Wood moot or mote. See moot.—Wood reed-grass. See reed-grass.—Wood stop, in organ-building, a stop the pipes of which are made of wood, as the flute, the stopped diapason, etc.—Wood tea. See tea.—Wood wind. See def. a. above. (For a multitude of other woods, see specific epithets.) = Syn. 1. Woods, Park, etc. See forest.

wood¹ (wud), r. [< wood¹, n.] I. trans. To supply or replenish with wood; get supplies of wood for; as, to wood a steamboat or a locomotive. [Collog.]

Many passengers would save a little by helping to "wood the boat": i. e., by carrying wood down the bank and throwing it on the boat, a special ticket being issued on that condition.

The Century, XL. 106.

II. intrans. To take in or get supplies of wood.

In this little [island] of Mevis, more than twenty yeares agoe, I have remained a good time together, to wood and water and refresh my men.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, II. 277.

Therefore, as soon as we came to an Anchor at the East end of the Island, we sent our Boat ashore to the Governnour, to desire leave to wood, water, and cut a new Mizen-yard.

wood-acid (wūd'as'id), n. Same as wood-rinegar. See vinegar.

Take 20 pounds terra japonica, 5 pounds of wood-acid, . . . to about 10 barrels of water, or enough of the latter to cover the hides.

C. T. Davis, Leather, p. 607.

wood-agate (wūd'ag'āt), n. An agate which shows more or less perfectly the structure of the wood from which it has been derived by a process of silicification.

wood-alcohol (wūd'al'kō-hol), n. See alcohol.

wood-almond (wūd'ā'mōnd), n. A shrub, Hippophaë comosa. See Hippophaë.

wood-anemone (wūd'ā-nēm'ō-nē), n. The wind-flower, Anemone nemorosa.

wood-ant (wūd'ant), n. 1. A large ant, as Formica rufa, which lives in the woods.—2. A white ant, or termite, as Termites flavipes, which lives in the wood of old buildings. See ant under Termes. [U. S.]

wood-apple (wūd'ap'pl), n. See Feronia, 1.

wood-ashes (wūd'ash'ez), n. pl. The remains of burned wood or plants.

wood-awl (wūd'āl), n. The green woodpecker, or awl-bird, Geococcyx viridis; same as woodwale. See ant under popinjay. [Cornwall, Eng.]

wood-baboon (wūd'ba-bōon), n. The drill; the cinereous or yellow baboon of Guinea, Cynocephalus leucophaeus. See drill.

wood-barley (wūd'bār'li), n. See Hordeum.

wood-beetle (wūd'bē'tl), n. See Panisside.

wood-betony (wūd'bet'ō-ni), n. See betony. Also called head-betony and lousewort.

wood-bill (wūd'bīl), n. In her., a bearing representing a woodmen's bill for lopping fagots, etc.

woodbine, woodbind (wūd'bīn, -bīnd), n. [Early mod. E. woodbynde; < ME. woodbynde, woodebynde, woodebynde, woodebynde, < AS. wudabīnd, wudabīnde, earlier uudabīnde, uudabīnde, uudabīndae; so called because it binds or winds round trees, < wuda, uudu, tree, wood, + bīndan, bind; see *wood*¹ and bind.] The common European honeysuckle, Lonicera Periclymenum, whence the name is more or less extended to other honeysuckles. L. grata, a species very similar to L. Periclymenum, is designated American woodbine. The name is also given to the Virginia creeper, Ampelopsis quinquefolia.

Spanish woodbine, the seven-year vine, or Spanish arbor-vine, Ipomœa tuberosa. See vine.—Wild woodbine, See wild.

wood-bird (wûd'bêrd), n. A bird that lives in the woods.

Begin these wood-birds but to couple now?

Shak., M. N. D., iv. 1. 145.

wood-block (wûd'blok), n. 1. In engraving, a die cut in relief on wood, and in condition for furnishing impressions in ink in a printing-press; a woodcut. See wood-engraving. The wood commonly used for wood-blocks is box, the blocks being cut directly across the grain. Inferior kinds of wood, such as American rock-maple, pear, plane, etc., are used for coarser work.

2. A print or impression from such an engraved block; a woodcut. Also used attributively in both senses; as, wood-block illustrations.

wood-boiler (wûd'boi'ler), n. A vessel adapted for boiling wood in order to soften it and thus facilitate working.

wood-borer (wûd'bôr'er), n. That which bores wood, as an insect, a crustacean, or a mollusk. Compare Cis, ship-worm, Superda, and teredo, and other citations under wood-boring.

wood-boring (wûd'bôr'ing), a. Capable of or characterized by boring wood; having the habits of a wood-borer; as, the wood-boring shipworms; wood-boring beetles. See gribble, Limoria, Chelurida, Lymerylon, ship-worm, and teredo.

wood-born (wûd'bôrn), a. Born in the woods. Spenser, F. Q., l. vi. 16. [Rare.]

wood-bound (wûd'bôund), a. Encumbered with tall woody hedgerows. Imp. Dict.

wood-brick (wûd'brik), n. A block of wood, of the shape and size of a brick, inserted in the interior walls of a building to afford a hold for the joinery, etc.

Woodbridge gun. See gun.

wood-broney (wûd'brô'ni), n. The common ash, Fraxinus excelsior. [Prov. Eng.]

wood-broom (wûd'brôm), n. The wild teazel, Dipsacus sylvestris.

wood-bug (wûd'bug), n. A forest-bug.

woodburytype (wûd'ber-i-tip), n. [Named after Walter Bentley Woodbury, the inventor.]

1. A photomechanical process in which a relief is produced from a negative on a film of bichromated gelatin, hardened in alum. This is pressed into a plate of soft metal, the result being an intaglio mold. A warm solution of gelatin containing any desired pigment is poured on the mold, a sheet of paper is laid over it, and pressure applied, the superfluous pigment of gelatin being squeezed out, and only that remaining in the intaglio mold and forming the image being left. When this sets it adheres to the paper, and is then fixed by hardening in a solution of alum. Compare heliotype.

2. A picture produced by this process.

wood-calamint (wûd'kal'â-mint), n. See Calamint.

wood-carpet (wûd'kâr'pet), n. 1. A floor-covering made of slats or more ornamental shapes of wood of different colors, fastened to a cloth backing. The different pieces of wood are arranged so as to produce the effects of tessellated floors, mosaic work, etc. Also called in the United States wood-carpeting.

2. A British geometrid moth, Melanippe rivata, common in the south of England.

wood-carver (wûd'kâr'vêr), n. One who carves wood.

The peasants are turners, lapidaries, electro-platers, wood-carvers, and spectacle-makers.

Edinburgh Rev., CLXVI. 310.

wood-carving (wûd'kâr'ving), n. 1. The art or process of carving wood.—2. A piece of sculpture in wood.

wood-cell (wûd'sel), n. A cell normally entering into the composition of the wood of plants. Wood-cells are one of the regular modifications of prosenchyma, consisting of cell-structures greatly elongated in proportion to their breadth, with very thick walls and usually pointed extremities. When thoroughly lignified, wood-cells take little active part in the metabolism of the plant, their function being mainly to give strength and power of resistance to it. Also called woody fiber. See prosenchyma, tissue, 4, and cut under disk, 4 (c).

wood-charcoal (wûd'châr'kôl), n. See charcoal, 1.

woodchat (wûd'chat), n. The red-backed shrike or butcher-bird of Africa and Europe, Lanius rufus. Also called L. auriculatus and by other names. It is occasionally seen in Great Britain in summer. The name is misleading, as the bird is not a chat in any proper sense.

woodchat-shrike (wûd'chat-shrik), n. The woodchat.

wood-chopper (wûd'chop'er), n. One who chops wood; specifically, one who cuts down trees, as a lumberman.

woodchuck (wûd'chuk), n. [Also woodshock, applied to a different quadruped; a corruption, simulating E. wood, of wejack, wejack, repr. an Amer. Ind. name, of which the Cree form is rendered otchock by Sir John Richardson.] The commonest North American species of marmot, Arctomys monax, a large rodent quadruped of the family Sciuridae. It is from 15 to 18 inches long, of very stout, heavy form, with brownish and grayish tints above, and reddish-brown below. It feeds on vegetables of many kinds, burrows in the ground, and hibernates in winter. Also called ground-hog and chuck. See cut under Arctomys.—Woodchuck day, in popular myth and rural tradition, the day on which the woodchuck first comes out of its hole after its hibernation, this action being regarded as affording a weather-prophecy. The saying goes that if the woodchuck sees its shadow on that day, it retires to its burrow for six weeks longer, which implies that warm, sunshiny weather very early in the spring, or in February, arousing the woodchuck from its torpidity, is likely to be followed by a cold or late season. Also ground-hog day.

woodchuck (wûd'chuk), n. [Prob. < wood + chuck, var. of chuck.] The green woodpecker, Geococcyx viridis. See cut under papinjay. [Prov. Eng.]

wood-chuck (wûd'chuk), n. In a lathe, a chuck adapted for holding a piece of wood to be operated on.

The stoppers are fixed in a hollow wood-chuck by slight blows of a mallet. O'Bryne, Artisan's Handbook, p. 145.

woodcoal (wûd'kôl), n. Charcoal.

woodcock (wûd'kok), n. [ME. wodecok, wodekok, wodecok, < AS. wuducoc, a woodcock; as wood + cock.] 1. One of two distinct birds of the family Scolopacidae, closely related to the true snipe (Gallinago). (a) In Europe, Scolopax rusticola (wrongly spelled rusticula), a very common bird of the northerly parts of the Old World, one of the largest and best-known representatives of its family, highly es-

European Woodcock (Scolopax rusticola).

teemed as a game-bird, its flesh being delicious, while the thick cover it inhabits and the rapidity of its flight test the nerve and skill of the sportsman. It is migratory, breeding chiefly in the higher latitudes, nesting upon the ground in a dry spot under cover, and laying four eggs. This woodcock is over 12 inches in length, and weighs from 10 to 15 ounces; the plumage is intimately variegated with brown, black, russet, and tawny. It is seldom seen in America, and only as a straggler from Europe. (b) In the United States and Canada, Philohela minor, a bird of the same general characteristics as the former, but smaller, usually under 12 inches in length, and weighing 9 ounces or less; the under parts are whole-colored, and there is a generic difference from Scolopax rusticola in the structure of the outer primaries, three of which are attenuated and abbreviated in Philohela. The sexes are alike in color, but the female is considerably larger than the male, and alone reaches the maximum size and weight above given; the male is usually 10 to 11 inches long and 16 to 17 in spread, weighing 5, 6, or 7 ounces according to condition. The bill is perfectly straight, 2½ to 3 inches long, and deeply furrowed; it is a very sensitive probe, with which the bird feels for worms in the mud by thrusting it in for its full length. The physiognomy of the woodcock is peculiar, by reason of the shape of the head, and the great size of the dark eyes, as well as their site high up and far back. The wings are short and rounded, but ample; the tail is very short, rounded, and usually held up; the legs are feathered to the heel, naked beyond; the toes are cleft quite to the base; there is a small hind toe, and the middle toe with its claw is rather longer than the tarsus. The woodcock is to some extent a nocturnal bird. It abounds in most of its range, and is one of the leading game-birds of America; it is found in bogs and swamps, wet woodlands, alder-brakes (sometimes called woodcock-brakes in consequence), and not seldom in quite dry fields, as corn-fields; it is migratory, but erratic and capricious in its movements, and nests throughout its range. The eggs are laid on the ground, generally in April (earlier or later according to latitude); they are less pointed than usual among waders, 1½ by 1½ inches in size, of a brownish-gray color, with very numerous and small chocolate-brown surface-spots and neutral-tint shell-spots; the full number is four. The woodcock has a peculiar bleating cry, and sometimes exhibits the curious habit of removing the young from danger by tying off with the chick, which is held in the parent's feet. Also called snipe, with or without qualifying words (see snipe, 1 (r)), American woodcock, little woodcock, lesser woodcock, red woodcock, wood-hen, hog-sucker, hogbird, timberdoodle, hookumpake, night-peck, night-partidger, shrips, cock (short for woodcock), and Labrador twister.

American Woodcock (Philohela minor).

2. The large black piliated woodpecker, or log-cock, Hylotomus (or Cophylus) plicatus. See cut under plicated. [Local, U. S.]

Woodcock . . . is applied by backwoodsmen and other country folk to the piliated woodpecker, . . . wherever that big red-crested bird the tall timber is found.

G. Trumbull, Bird Names (1888), p. 151.

3. In conch., a woodcock-shell; more fully called thorny woodcock. Also called Venus's-comb.—4. A simpleton; in allusion to the facility with which the European woodcock allows itself to be taken in springs or in nets set for it in the glades.

Go, like a woodcock,

And thrust your neck 't the noose.

Beau. and Fl., Loyal Subject, iv. 5.

Among us in England this bird is infamous for its simplicity or folly, so that a woodcock is proverbially used for a foolish, simple person. Willoughby.

Little woodcock. (a) The great or double snipe, or woodcock-snipe, Gallinago major. [British.] (b) The American woodcock, Philohela minor; a book-name. [U. S.]—Springs to catch woodcocks, arts to entrap simplicity. Shak., Hamlet, i. 3. 115.—Woodcock's cross, penitence for folly.

Not controversies now are in disputes
At Westminster, where such a cock they keep;
Where man doth man within the law betosse,
Till some go crossless home by Woodcock's cross.

John Taylor, Works (1630). (Nares.)

Woodcock's head. (a) A tobacco-pipe; so called from the shape.

Sar. O peace, I pray you, I love not the breath of a woodcock's head.

Faust. Meaning my head, lady?

Sar. Not altogether so, sir; but as it were fatal to their follies that think to grace themselves with taking tobacco, when they want better entertainment, you see your pipe bears the true form of a woodcock's head.

B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, iii. 3.

(b) A woodcock-shell, as Murex haustellum.

woodcock-eye (wûd'kok-i), n. A snap-hook. E. H. Knight, [Eng.]

woodcock-fish (wûd'kok-fish), n. The sea-woodcock or trumpet-fish, Centrus (or Macrorhamphosus) scolopax; so called from the long beak, like that of the snipe or woodcock. See cut under snipe-fish.

woodcock-owl (wûd'kok-oul), n. The short-eared owl, Bubo accipitrinus, Otus brachyotus, or Brachyotus palustris; so called from its association with the European woodcock. [Local, Eng. and Ireland.]

woodcock-pilot (wûd'kok-pi lot), n. The European gold-crested kinglet, Regulus cristatus; so called as preceding the woodcock in migration. See cut under goldcrest. [Local, Eng.]

woodcock-shell (wûd'kok-shel), n. One of several murine shells which have a long spout or beak, as Murex tribulus or M. tenuispina; a woodcock, woodcock's head, or Venus's-comb. See cut under Murex.

woodcock-snipe (wûd'kok-snip), n. Same as little woodcock (a) (which see, under woodcock).

wood-copper (wûd'kop'er), n. See aldercut.

wood-corn (wûd'kôrn), n. A certain quantity of grain paid by the tenants of some manors in Great Britain to the lord of the manor for the liberty to pick up dead or broken wood.

woodcracker (wûd'krak'er), n. The common European nutcracker or nuthatch, Sitta casus or S. europæa. See cut under Sitta. [Plot, Nat. Hist. Oxford, p. 175. (Varrell.)] [Local, Eng.]

woodcraft (wûd'kraft), n. [ME. wodercraft; < wood + craft.] Skill in anything which pertains to the woods or forest; skill in the chase, especially in hunting deer, etc.

What were woodcraft without fatigue and without danger? Scott, Quentin Durward, x.

wood-crash (wûd'krash), n. A machine, made on the principle of a spring-rattle, used in theaters to imitate the sound of breaking timbers.

wood-cricket (wûd'krik'et), n. A kind of cricket that lives in the woods; specifically, Nemobius sylvestris, of Europe.

wood-culver (wûd'kul'ver), n. The wood-pigeon or ring-dove, Columba palumbus. Also wood-quest. [Prov. Eng.]

woodcut (wûd'kut), n. An engraving on wood, or a print from such an engraving. See wood-engraving.—Woodcut-paper, a soft paper of very fine fair and smooth face, half-sized or wholly unsized, readily receptive of ink or impression. Sometimes called plate-paper.

wood-cutter (wūd'kūt'ēr), n. 1. A person who cuts wood.—2. A maker of woodcuts; an engraver on wood. See wood-engraving.

wood-cutting (wūd'kūt'ing), n. 1. The act or employment of cutting wood by means of saws or by the application of knife-edge machinery.—2. Wood-engraving.

wood-dove (wūd'duv), n. [ME. wodeclouwe, woodclouwe, wodecloure; < *wood*¹ + *dore*¹.] The stock-dove, Columbaenas; also, the common wood-pigeon, C. palumbus.

The wood-dove upon the spray
She sang full loud and clear.
Chaucer, Sir Thopas, l. 59.

wood-drink (wūd'dringk), n. A decoction or infusion of medicinal woods, as of sassafras.

wood-duck (wūd'duk), n. 1. The summer duck, Aix sponsa; more fully called crested wood-duck.

Wood-duck, or Summer Duck (Aix sponsa), male.

and also bridal duck, acorn-duck, tree-duck, wood-widgeon, and widgeon.—2. The hooded merganser, Lophodytes cucullatus. Also tree-duck. See cut under merganser. [Western U. S.] wood-eater (wūd'ē'tēr), n. That which eats wood: a wood-borer; a wood-fretter; specifically, the gribble, Lignaria lignorum. It is very injurious to submerged timber, and occasionally useful in hastening the decay and consequent removal of snags and wrecks.

wooded (wūd'ed), a. [*< wood*¹ + *-ed*².] 1. Supplied or covered with wood; abounding in wood: as, land well wooded and watered.

The brook escaped from the eye into a deep and wooded dell.
Scott.

2). Hence, figuratively, thickly or densely covered; crowded.

The hills are wooded with their partisans.
Beau, and Fl., Bonduca, i. 2.

wood-embossing (wūd'em-bos'ing), n. A method of ornamenting flat surfaces of wood in imitation of wood-carving. The wood, softened by steam, is passed between engraved rolls in a wood-carving machine, and impressed with patterns in low relief. Another process burns the design into the wood, by means of heated dies.

wooden (wūd'n), a. [Early mod. E. also woden; < *wood*¹ + *-en*².] 1. Made of wood; consisting of wood.

Bartholoph and Nym had ten times more valour than this roaring devil i the old play, that every one may pare his nails with a wooden dagger.
Shak., Hen. V., iv. l. 77.

I saw the images of many of the French Kings, set in certain wooden cupbords.
Corpus, Crutides, l. 44.

2. Stiff; ungainly; clumsy; awkward; spiritless; expressionless: as, a wooden stare.

It is a sport to see when a bold fellow is out of countenance, for that puts his face into almost shrunken and wooden posture.
Bacon, Boldness (ed. 1887).

3. Dull; stupid, as if with no more sensation than wood.

Who have so leaden eyes as not to see sweet Beauty's show?
Or, seeing, have so wooden wits as not that worth to know.
Sir P. Sidney (Arber's Eng. Garner, l. 570).

4). Of the woods; sylvan.

And how the worthy mystery befall Sylvanus here, this wooden god, can tell.
Chapman, Gentleman Usher, l. 1.

Wooden brick. Same as wood brick. Wooden fuse. See *fuse*². Wooden horse. (a) A ship.

Milford Haven, the chief stable for his wooden horses.
Fidler, General Worthies, vi.

A wooden horse he rides through the world, and in a merry gale makes a path through the seas.
Breton, Good and Bad, p. 9. (Daries.)

(b) An instrument of military punishment consisting of a beam or timber, sometimes set with sharp points, upon which the culprit was compelled to sit astride, having in some instances weights tied to his feet. Wooden leg, an artificial leg made of wood. Wooden mill, in gem-cutting, a circular disk of wood, usually poplar, about 1 inches thick, and cut across the grain, which, when charged with pumice and water, is used for cutting gems en cabochon.

Wooden pavement, a pavement or causeway consisting of blocks of wood instead of stone or the like.

Wooden pear. See pearl.—Wooden screw, a screw of wood such as is used in the clamping-jaw of a carpenter's bench.—Wooden shoe. See shoe.—Wooden spoon. (a) A large spoon made of wood, for mixing salad, and for use in cookery. (b) See *spoon*¹.—Wooden tongue. See tongue.—Wooden type, large type cut in wood, used for printing posters, etc.—Wooden wedding. See wedding.—Wooden wedge. See *wedge*¹.—Syn. 1. See lead.

wood-end (wūd'end), n. Same as hood-end.

wood-engraver (wūd'eu-grā'vēr), n. 1. An artist who engraves on wood.—2. In entom., any one of several bark-beetles of the genus Xyleborus and allied genera; specifically,

X. calatus. This works in the cambium layer of pine-trees in the United States in such a way that, on removing the loosened bark, the surface of the wood is seen furrowed in a regular and artistic manner, numerous galleries passing off at right angles from a straight median tunnel.

wood-engraving (wūd'en-grā'ving), n. 1. The art or process of cutting designs in relief upon blocks of wood, usually box, so that impressions can be made from them with a pigment in a printing-press, upon paper or other material.

For cuts of more than 5 or 6 inches square, two or more blocks are firmly secured together. The surface of the smoothed block, which is cut directly across the grain, is prepared for the engraver by rubbing it with pounded bath brick mixed with a little water, in order to give a hold to the lead-pencil, and the subject is drawn in with pencil or India ink, or is transferred upon the block by photography. The engraver then, by means of gravers, tint-tools, gouges or scrapers, and flat tools or chisels of different sizes, cuts out the design, leaving it in raised lines or dots upon the surface of the block, so that these may receive the ink and yield the desired impression under the action of the press. In such parts of the design as are to be solid black, the engraver leaves the surface of the wood untouched; in such parts as are to be wholly white, he cuts the surface entirely away; the large number of tones, technically called tints, between these extremes are rendered by cutting out wider or narrower spaces, corresponding to white paper in the print, between the lines or dots left in relief. An engraving is seldom a mere reproduction of the copy; it is a translation, into which the personal element of the engraver enters: thus the engraving may be either superior or inferior artistically to the original. Wood-engraving is technically the opposite of steel- or copperplate-engraving: in the latter the lines cut by the engraver form the picture; in the former the parts of the surface left uncut form the picture.

2. A block of wood engraved by the above method, or an impression from such a block.

woodenhead (wūd'n-hed), n. A blockhead; a thick-headed, dull, or stupid person; a numskull. [Colloq.] wooden-headed (wūd'n-hed'ed), a. Thick-headed; stupid; lacking penetration or discernment.

wooden-headedness (wūd'n-hed'ed-nes), n. The state or character of being wooden-headed; stupidity. [Colloq.]

I overheard some rather strong language going on within, words such as "wooden-headedness" and "nibs" being used.
Light, Feb. 23, 1889.

woodenly (wūd'n-li), adv. In a wooden manner; stiffly; clumsily; awkwardly; without feeling or sympathy.

Diverse thought to have some sport in seeing how woodenly he would excuse himself.
Roger North, Lord Guilford, II. 22.

woodiness (wūd'n-nes), n. Wooden character or quality; stiffness; lack of spirit or expression; clumsiness; stupidity.

woodenware (wūd'n-wär), n. A general name for bowls, dishes, etc., turned from solid blocks of wood: often used also of coopers' work, such as pails and tubs.

wood-evil (wūd'ē'vī), n. Same as red water (which see, under water).

woodfall (wūd'fāl), n. A fall or cutting of timber.

The woodfalls this year do not amount to half that sum of twenty-five thousand pounds.
Bacon.

wood-fern (wūd'fēr), n. See Aspidium and polypody.

wood-fiber (wūd'fī'hēr), n. Fiber derived from wood; specifically, the fiber obtained from various species of Abies, Betula, Populus, Tilia, etc., employed as a material for the manufacture of paper-pulp. See wood-paper and wood-pulp.

wood-flour (wūd'flour), n. Very fine sawdust, especially that made from pine wood for use as a surgical dressing.

Woodfordia (wūd-fōr'dī-ā), n. [NL. (Salisbury, 1806), named after J. Woodford, author (1824) of Wood-engraver (Xyleborus calatus), eight times natural size.

a catalogue of the plants of Edinburgh.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Lyth-ruriceæ and tribe Lythreæ. It is characterized by black-dotted leaves, a curved tubular calyx, declined stamens, and pilose seeds. The only species, W. floribunda, is a native of India, China, eastern tropical Africa, and Madagascar. It is a much-branched shrub, hoary with grayish hairs, producing round branches and square branchlets, with opposite ovate-lanceolate entire whitish leaves. The flowers are scarlet, and crowded into cymose panicles. See thauri.

Ep. Hall, quoted in Strutt's Sports and Pastimes, p. 230.

wood-ibis (wúd'í'bis), n. A large gallatorial bird of the stork kind, Tantalus (or Tantolops) localator, which abounds in the wooded swamps and bayous of southerly regions of the United States; hence, any stork of the subfamily Tantalinae; a wood-stork. These birds are ibises in no proper sense. The species named is nearly 4 feet long, and 5½ feet in extent of wings. The adult of both sexes is snow-white with black primaries, alula, and tail, with the bald head livid-bluish and yellowish, the very heavy bill dingy-yellowish, the bare legs black. The weight is 10 or 12 pounds. The young are dark gray, with blackish wings and tail. These birds are gregarious, nest in large heronries, and lay two or three white eggs of elliptical shape, incrimbed with a dusky substance, and measuring 2½ by 1½ inches. This wood-ibis is known on the Colorado river as the Colorado water-turkey; it occasionally strays to the Middle States, and spreads south in the West Indies, Central America, and parts of South America. Similar birds inhabit tropical and subtropical regions of the Old World. See cut under Tantalus.

woodie (wúd'í), n. A dialectal form of widdy, itself a dialectal variant of withy, 3: applied humorously to the gallows. [Scotch.]

Half the country will see how ye'll grave the woodie.
Scott, Guy Mannering, xxviii. (Encyc. Diet.)

woodiness (wúd'í-nēs), n. The state or character of being woody. Evelyn.

wood-inlay (wúd'in'lā), n. Decoration by means of the incrustation of one wood in another. Compare tarsia.

woodish (wúd'ish), a. [*< wood*¹ + -ish, 1.] Sylvan.

The many mirthful jests, and wanton woodish sports.
Drayton, Polyolbion, s. 11. (Encyc. Diet.)

wood-jobber (wúd'job'ér), n. A woodpecker.
woodkern (wúd'kérn), n. 1. A robber who infests woods; a forest-haunting bandit. Holland.—2. A boor; a churl.

The rich central pasture lands were occupied by the clans; the surrounding poorer soils were almost desolate or roamed by a few scattered wood-kernes.

Fortnightly Rev., XL, 200.

wood-kingfisher (wúd'king'fish-ér), n. A kingfisher of the genus Dacelo in a broad sense; a kinghunter or haleyon, as the laughing-jackass. See Dacelonina, and cut under Dacelo.

wood-knacker (wúd'nak'ér), n. The green woodpecker, Geococcyx viridis. See cut under popinjay. [Prov. Eng.]

wood-knife (wúd'níf), n. A short sword or dagger, used in hunting and for various purposes for which the long sword was too cumbersome.

He pulld forth a wood knife,
Fast thither that he ran;
He brought in the bores head,
And quitted him like a man.

The Boy and the Mantle (Child's Ballads, I, 14).

woodland (wúd'land), n. and a. [*< ME. wode-land, wodeclond, < AS. wuducland; as wood*¹ + land, 1.] 1. Land covered with wood, or land on which trees are suffered to grow, either for fuel or for timber.

Here hills and vales, the woodland and the plain,
Here earth and water seem to strive again.

And Agamemnon lifts his blue Disk of a cloud the woodlands o'er.

Whittier, The Wreck of Rivermouth.

= Syn. Woods, Park, etc. See forest.

II. a. Of, peculiar to, or inhabiting the woods; sylvan; as, woodland echoes; woodland songsters.

The woodland choir. Fenton.

I am a woodland fellow, sir, that always loved a great fire.
Shak., All's Well, iv. 5. 49.

Woodland caribou, woodland reindeer, the common caribou of North America, as found in wooded regions, and as distinguished from the barren-ground reindeer, which occurs beyond the limit of trees. See cut under caribou.

woodlander (wúd'lan-dér), n. An inhabitant of the woods.

Every friend and fellow-woodlander.

Kent's, Endymion, ii.

woodlark (wúd'lärk), n. A European lark, Alauda arvensis, of more decidedly arboreal habits than the skylark, to which it is closely related. It differs from the latter chiefly in being somewhat smaller, with shorter tail and more marked variegation of the colors, but its song is quite different. The nest is placed on the ground, and the eggs are four or five in number, of a white color spotted with reddish-brown. The woodlark is migratory, and widely distributed at different seasons. It is common in some parts of Great Britain, but rare in Scotland. See cut under Alauda.

wood-layer (wúd'lā'ér), n. A young oak or other timber-plant laid down among the thorn or other plants used in hedges.

wood-leopard (wúd'lep'árd), n. A beautiful white black-spotted moth, Zenzera pyrina, the larva of which lives in wood; the wood leopard-moth. This insect has been discovered in the United States since the definition of leopard-moth was published in this dictionary.

woodless (wúd'les), a. [*< wood*¹ + -less, 1.] Without timber; untimbered.

wood-lily (wúd'il'í), n. 1. The lily of the valley, Convallaria majalis; locally (from a resemblance in the racemes), the winter-green, Pyrola minor. [Eng.].—2. A plant of the genus Trillium.

wood-liverwort (wúd'liv'ér-wér't), n. A lichen, Sticta pulmonacea, which frequently grows on trees. See cut under apothecium.

wood-lock (wúd'lok), n. In ship-building, a piece of hard wood, close fitted and sheathed with copper, in the throating or score of the pintle, to keep the rudder from rising. Thearle, Naval Arch., ¶ 233.

wood-louse (wúd'lous), n. 1. Any terrestrial isopod of the family Oniscidae. The common wood-louse of England is a species of Oniscus. Also called hog-louse, saw-bug, slater, etc. See cuts under Isopoda and Oniscus.—2. A termite, or white ant, as Termes flavipes; any member of the Termitidae. See cut under Termes. [Local, U. S.].—3. Any one of the small whitish species of the pseudoscorpion family Psocida, found in the woodwork of houses; the death-watch; a book-louse. See book-louse, Psocida, and cut under death-watch.—4. Same as woodlouse-milleped.

woodlouse-milleped (wúd'lous-mil e-ped), n. A milleped of the family Glomerida.

woody (wúd'í), adv. [*< ME. woody, woody, wode-liche; < wood*² + -ly, 2.] Madly; furiously; wildly.

Whan he wigtli a wok wodi he ferde,
Al to-tare his a-tir that he to-tere might.

William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), I, 3884.

Therewith the fyr of jelousye upsterte
Withinne his brest, and hente him by the herte
So woody that he lyk was to bilohde
The box tre or the ashden drede and colde.

Chaucer, Knight's Tale, I, 443.

woodman (wúd'man), n.; pl. woodmen (-men). [Early mod. E. woodman; *< wood*¹ + man, 1.] 1. An officer appointed to take care of the king's woods; a forester. Cowell.—2. A woodsman; a hunter.

Am I a woodman, ha? Speak I like Herne the hunter?
Shak., M. W. of W., v. 5. 30.

'Tis dangerous keeping the Fool too long at Bay, lest some old Wood-man drop in By chance, and discover thou art but a Rascal Deer.

Etherege, Love in a Tub, v. 4.

3. One who fells timber.

Forth goes the woodman, leaving unconcerned
The cheerful haunts of man, to wield the axe
And drive the wedge in yonder forest drear.

Cowper, The Task, v. 41.

War-woodman of old Woden, how he fells
The mortal corpse of faces! Tennyson, Harold, v. 1.

wood-note (wúd'nót), n. A wild or natural musical tone, like that of a forest-bird, as the wood-lark, wood-thrush, or nightingale.

or sweetest Shakespeare, Fancy's child, Warble his native wood-notes wild.

Milton, L'Allegro, l. 134.

wood-nut (wúd'nút), n. The European hazelnut, Corylus avellana.

wood-nymph (wúd'nimf), n. 1. A goddess of the woods; a dryad.

By dimpled brook and fountain-brim
The wood-nymphs, deck'd with daisies trim,
Their merry wakes and pastimes keep.

Milton, Comus, l. 120.

2. The humming-bird Thalurania glaucopis.—3. One of several zygaenid moths, of the genus Beautiful Wood-nymph (Eudryas grata), natural size.

Eudryas, as E. grata, the beautiful wood-nymph, and E. unio, the pearl wood-nymph. The larvae of both of these species feed on the vine in the United States.

wood-offering (wúd'of'ér-ing), n. Wood burnt on the altar.

We cast the lots
Among the priests,
The Levites, and the people for the wood offering. Neh. x. 34.

Pearl Wood-nymph (Eudryas unio), natural size.

wood-of-the-holy-croset, n. [Trans. of L. lig-num sanctæ crucis.] A name once given to the mistletoe, Viscum album, from its reputed virtue in helping the infirmities of old age. Treas. of Bot.

wood-oil (wúd'oil), n. 1. See gurjun.—2. Same as tung-oil.—3. A product of the satinwood, Chloroxylon Swietenia.

wood-opal (wúd'ó'pál), n. Silicified wood; opalized wood. It is found in great abundance in many parts of the world, but especially in the numerous gravels of the Sierra Nevada of California, where extensive forests have been exposed by hydraulic mining, in which the trunks of the trees have been converted into amorphous silica, or opal, which usually contains a small percentage of water, although this is not considered as being essential to its composition. Also called zygalop. See fossil wood (under wood), and silicify.

wood-owl (wúd'oul), n. The European tawny or brown owl, Syrnium aluco, or a similar species, as the barred owl of the United States. They are earless owls, of medium to large size, the species of which are numerous and live in the woods of most parts of the world. See cut under Strix.

wood-paper (wúd'pa per), n. A trade-name for paper made in part or in whole of pulp prepared by chemical and mechanical means from wood. The wood employed is usually poplar, though pine, fir, basswood, and beech are largely used. By the mechanical process the wood is ground to fine powder suitable for pulp, and by the chemical process the wood, cut up into small pieces, is digested with various chemicals to free it from the sap and other useless matter, to bleach it, and to reduce it to fine, loose pulp. See pulp digester, wood-grinder, and paper.

wood-parenchyma (wúd'pa-reng ki-mí), n. A combination of wood or fiber usually classed as parenchyma, but intermediate between this and prosenchyma. Each fiber consists of three cells, one of which has flattened ends, while the other two, attached to these ends, are pointed.

wood-partridge (wúd'pär tríj), n. The Canada grouse. See grouse, wood-grouse, and cut under Canada. [Local, U. S.]

wood-pavement (wúd'páv meñt), n. Pavement composed of blocks of wood; first used in London in 1839.

wood-pea (wúd'pé), n. See pearl.

wood-peat (wúd'pét), n. Peat formed in forests from decayed wood, leaves, etc. Also called forest-peat.

woodpeck (wúd'pek), n. The woodpecker.

Nor wood-pecks, nor the swallow, harbour near.
Addison, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, iv.

all other woodpeckers in having the plumage of the under parts hair-like by reason of disconnection of the barbs of the feathers. It is 10 to 12 inches long, greenish-black with bronze luster, a patch of velvety crimson feathers on the face, the under parts and a collar round the neck hoary-gray, heightened to rose- or lake-red on the belly. Also called clay-colored and bristle-bellied woodpecker.—Lineated woodpecker, Ceophloeus or Dryocopus (formerly Picus) lineatus, of Central and South America, of rather large size (14 inches long), crested with crimson, and otherwise resembling the pileated woodpecker, to which it is nearly related.—Little brown woodpecker, Ichneopicus gymnothorax, of Ceylon and the point of the Indian peninsula, 4½ inches long. Latham, 1757.—Magellanic woodpecker, Ipecator magellanicus, a monotypic species of Chili and Patagonia, 15 inches long, mostly blue-black with scarlet crested head.—Malaccan woodpecker, Chrysophlegma malaccensis, of the Malay countries, Sumatra, and Borneo. It is one of a group of about 8 oriental species of this genus. Latham, 1757.—Manilla green woodpecker, the Cape woodpecker (by a geographical blunder). Latham, 1752.—Maria's woodpecker, a young hairy woodpecker, named Picus martinus by Audubon in 1839 after a Miss Maria Martin.—Masked woodpeckers, the genus Xenopicus. Coues, 1884.—Narrow-fronted woodpecker, Melanerpes formicivorus angustifrons, a variety found in Lower California, having not the forehead but the white frontal stripe narrower than usual.—Nubian woodpecker, the leading species of a group of about 12 species composing the Ethiopian genus Campothera; C. nubica, of Abyssinia and south to equatorial Africa. Latham, 1752.—Nuchal woodpecker, a western variety of the sapsucker, Sphyrapicus varius nuchalis, showing more red on the head, and thus an approach to S. ruber.—Nuttall's woodpecker, Picus (Dendrocopos) nuttalli, the ladder-backed woodpecker of the Pacific slope of the United States, very near the Texan; named in 1843 by Dr. W. Gambel in compliment to the botanist Thomas Nuttall.—Orange woodpecker, Brachypterus aurantius, of northern India, in part of the color named, and 11 inches long, the male of which was originally described in 1760 by Brisson as pie du Cap de Bonne Esperance, and the female the same year by the same as pie verd de Bengal, whence the Linnean (1766) Picus aurantius and Picus bengalensis. The same bird served also as the type of Malherbe's genus Brachypicus, dedicated to the leading personage of the Hindu Trimurti.—Phillips's woodpecker, a young hairy woodpecker; so named as a distinct species in 1839, by Audubon, after Benjamin Phillips, F. R. S.—Pileated woodpecker, the black log-cock of North America, Hylotermus or Drymotermes or Phloeotermes or Ceophloeus pilatus, originally Picus pilatus. See cut under pileated.—Pole-backed three-toed woodpecker, Picoides americanus dorsalis, having a long white stripe lengthwise down the middle of the black back, of the Rocky Mountain region of the United States.—Raffles's woodpecker, Geoprocoides rafflesi, a monotype inhabiting Tenasserim, the Malay peninsula, Sumatra, and Borneo, originally named Picus rafflesi by Vigors, in 1831, after Sir Stamford Raffles. The upper parts are mostly uniform golden-olive.—Rayed woodpecker, one of the zebra-woodpeckers, Cebras or Cebrasus or Zebrapicus striatus, of Hayti and San Domingo. Latham, 1752.—Red-bellied woodpecker, Centurus carolinus, one of the zebra-woodpeckers, common in the United States. See cut under Centurus.—Red-breasted woodpecker, Sphyrapicus ruber, the sapsucker of the Pacific coast of the United States, like S. carolinus, but having the whole head, neck, and breast carmine-red in both sexes.—Red-cheeked woodpecker (of Edwards, 1764), Celex undatus, a crested Amazonian species of a genus of 14 species peculiar to the Neotropical region.—Red-crowned woodpecker. See Red-crowned.—Red-headed woodpecker, Melanerpes erythrocephalus; so named by Catesby in 1731. See cut under Melanerpes.—Red-shafted woodpecker, the Mexican flicker, Colaptes mexicanus.—Red-throated woodpecker, the adult male of the thyroid woodpecker, formerly described as Melanerpes rubrigularis (Schaler).—St. Lucas woodpecker, the ladder-backed woodpecker of Lower California; a local race called Picus scalaris leucanatus.—Sap-sucking woodpeckers, the true sapsuckers of the genus Sphyrapicus (which see, with cut).—Smallest spotted woodpecker, the downy woodpecker. Catesby, 1731.—Strickland's woodpecker, Picus (Dendrocopos) stricklandi, of south-eastern Mexico, dedicated in 1845 by Malherbe to Hugh E. Strickland, principal author of the Stricklandian code of nomenclature in ornithology. It is 7½ inches long, has the back and rump barred with blackish-brown and whitish, the under parts white, fully streaked with black.—Superciliary woodpecker. See Superciliary.—Texan woodpecker, the ladder-backed woodpecker of Texas to Arizona and southward to Yucatan, Picus (Dendrocopos) scalaris, 5½ to 6½ inches long, having the upper parts regularly barred crosswise with white and black. Also called Texan sapsucker.—Three-toed woodpecker, any species of several different genera of Picidae, in which the first digit (inner hind toe) is lacking. This peculiarity recurs in genera otherwise very close to those in which the feet are normally 3-toed, so that the species which exhibit it do not form a group by themselves. The three-toed genera are Picoides, Geoprocoides, Gecinulus, and Tiga (see cut under Tiga). The same peculiarity marks the genus Sasia among the Picumninae.—Thyroid woodpecker, Sphyrapicus thyroideus, a remarkable sapsucker of western North America, the opposite sexes of which differ so much that they have been placed in separate genera, and repeatedly described as different species, called brown-headed, red-throated, Williamson's, etc., woodpecker, Picus thyroideus (Cassin, 1851), Colaptes thyroideus, Picus natalis (Malherbe, 1854), Centurus natalis, Picus williamsi (Newberry, 1857), Melanerpes thyroideus, M. rubrigularis, etc. The length is 9 to 9½ inches, the extent 16 to 17; the adult male is glossy blue-black, with scarlet throat, and oblique wing-bar, two stripes on each side of the head, and some other markings white; the female is only continuously black in a shield-shaped area on the breast, otherwise barred closely and regularly with black and white or white-brown, the head uniform hair-brown, the quills marked with white spots in rows of pairs. The sexual differences begin with nestlings as soon as they are fledged, contrary to one of the broadest rules in ornithology,—namely, that, when the adults of opposite sexes differ decidedly in color, the young males resemble the female, and acquire their distinctive markings at maturity only.—Tricolor woodpeckers, the members of the restricted genus Merula, as the red-headed. See cut under Merula. Coccyzus.—White-backed woodpecker, Picus (Dendrocopos) leucocatus (originally misprinted leucatus—Reichenstein, 1802), 10 inches long, having the lower back white, extending from northwestern Europe to Manchuria, Corea, and Mongolia.—White-headed woodpecker, Xenopicus albocapillus. See Xenopicus (with cut).—White-rumped woodpecker, the red-headed woodpecker. See cut under Merula. Latham, 1782.—Williamson's woodpecker, the adult male of the thyroide woodpecker, formerly described by Dr. J. S. Newberry in 1857 as Picus williamsoni, after Lieutenant R. S. Williamson, United States army.—Woodpecker hornbill, an Asiatic species of Bucconidae. Buceros pica (of Seepoli, 1786, now Anthraceros coronatus), of a black and white color, inhabiting India and Ceylon.—Yellow-bellied woodpecker, the common sapsucker; so named originally by Catesby, 1731. See sapsucker (with cut), and Sphyrapicus.—Yellow blue-footed Persian woodpecker (Picus luteus cyanopus persicus of Aldrovandi), the popinjay. Latham, 1782.—Yellow-fronted woodpecker, Centurus aurifrons, one of the zebra-woodpeckers, of Texas and Arizona, having the forehead and nasal plumbeous golden-yellow, the head and under parts clear ashy-gray, becoming yellowish on the belly, and the upper tail-coverts continuously white.—Yellow-necked woodpecker, Gecinus chlorophus, a popinjay of Nepal, parts of the Himalayas, Bengal, Manipur, Assam, Burma, and the Malay peninsula. Latham, 1822.—Yellow-winged woodpecker. Same as flicker 2.—Zebra woodpeckers. See zebra-woodpecker, and cut under Centurus.

wood-pewee (wūd'pē'wē), n. A tyrannuline, or little oliveaceous flycatcher, of the genus Contopus, the species of which are numerous in the warmer parts of both Americas. The common wood-pewee, C. virens, is the most abundant of its tribe in the woodlands of many parts of North America. It resembles the wood-pewee, or pewee flycatcher (compare cuts under Contopus and pewee), but is smaller (only 6 or 6½ inches long, and 10 or 11 in extent), with extremely small feet, and broad flat beak; the feet and upper mandible are black; the lower mandible is usually yellow; the eyes are brown; the plumage is olive-brown above, below dingy-whitish tinged with yellow and shaded with the color of the back, especially across the breast and along the sides. The nest is flatly saddled on a horizontal bough, stuccoed with lichens; the eggs are four or five in number, creamy-white, marked with reddish-brown and blue spots usually wreathed about the larger end. The note is a long-drawn querulous whistle of two or three syllables, initiated in the word pewee. The western wood-pewee is C. v. richardsoni.

wood-pie (wūd'pī), n. The woodpecker; so called with reference to the spotted plumage; locally applied to the greater and lesser spotted woodpeckers, Picus major and P. minor, and the green woodpecker, Gecinus viridis. See cuts under Picus and popinjay. [Local, British.]

wood-pigeon (wūd'pī'jōn), n. 1. The wood-culver, wood-quest, cushat, or ring-dove, Columba palumbus; also, sometimes, the stock-dove, C. anas. [Eng.]—2. In the western United States, the band-tailed pigeon, Columba fasciata. This is one of the few American pigeons congeneric with an Old World type (that figured under white-crowned being another). It is a large stout species (16 inches long and about 27 in extent), the adult male having the head, neck, and under parts vinaceous, fading to white on the crissum, the sides of the neck iridescent, a sharp white half-collar on the back of the neck (whence also called white-collared pigeon), the tail marked with a light terminal and dark subterminal bar (whence band-tailed pigeon), the bill yellow tipped with black, the feet yellow with black claws, and a red ring round the eye. It is of common but irregular distribution, chiefly in woodland, from the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific, feeds mainly on mast, nests in trees and bushes, and lays (as usual in this family) two white eggs.

wood-pile (wūd'pī), n. A stack or pile of wood, especially of wood for fuel.

And, take it in the autumn, what can be pleasanter than to spend a whole day on the sunny side of a barn or a wood-pile, chatting with somebody as old as one's self?

Hawthorne, Seven Gables, iv.

wood-pimpernel (wūd'pīm'pēr-nel), n. A European species of loosestrife, Lysimachia nemorum, somewhat resembling the common pimpernel.

wood-puceron (wūd'pū'se-ron), n. [< wood + P. puceron, < puce, OF. pule = It. pulce, < L. puler, flea.] A kind of aphid or plant-louse.

wood-pulp (wūd'pulp), n. Wood-fiber reduced to a pulp, either mechanically or chemically, for use in the manufacture of paper. Almost any wood may be used; the amount of cellulose varies from 39.41 per cent. in oak to 56.99 per cent. in fir. The easily worked woods are preferred, cottonwood and other poplars being largely used in North America. The amount thus consumed in America and continental Europe is very large. Compare wood-paper.

wood-quail (wūd'kwāl), n. Any bird of the genus Rollulus; a roulroul. See cut under Rollulus.

wood-quest (wūd'kwēst), n. The ring-dove, Columba palumbus; same as quest.

Me thought I saw a stock-dove, or wood-quest, I know not how to term it, that brought short straws to build his nest on a tall cedar.

Lyly, Sapho and Phao, iv. 3. (Nares.)

wood-rabbit (wūd'rab'it), n. The common gray rabbit of the United States, Lepus sylvaticus. See cut under cottontail.

wood-rat (wūd'rat), n. Any species of Neotoma, including large woodland rats of the United States, etc., of the family Muridae, subfamily Murinae, and section Sigmodontes, such as the Florida wood-rat, N. floridana; the Rocky Mountain wood-rat, N. cinerea; the California wood-rat, N. fuscipes; the Texas wood-rat, N. micropus; the ferruginous wood-rat of Mexico and Central America, N. ferruginea. See pack-rat (under rat), and cut under Neotoma.

wood-reed (wūd'rēd), n. See reed 1.

woodreeve (wūd'rēv), n. In England, the steward or overseer of a wood or forest.

wood-robin (wūd'rob'in), n. The American wood-thrush, Turdus mustelinus. [Local, U.S.]

wood-rock (wūd'rok), n. Ligniform asbestos.

woodruff, woodroof (wūd'ruf, -rōf), n. [Early mod. E. woodrafe; < ME. woderufo, woderare, woderore, < AS. wuderufo, wuderofe, < wudu, wood, + rofe*, of uncertain meaning.] A rubiacaceous herb, Asperula odorata, of Europe and Asiatic Russia, more fully named sweet woodruff. It has a creeping rootstock sending up erect stems, the leaves whorled, chiefly in eights, the flowers small, white, in loose cymes. The plant, from the presence of coumarin, is scented like the sweet vernal-grass and sweet-clover, and in parts of Europe it is used to flavor the spring beverage called May-drink (which see). Woodruff is sometimes found growing near German settlements in the United States. The name is extended to the other species of Asperula.—Dyers' woodruff, Asperula tinctoria, of Europe, whose roots sometimes serve in place of madder.—Quinsy-woodruff. Same as quinsywort.—Sweet woodruff. See cut.

wood-rush (wūd'rush), n. [< wood + rush 1, n.] A plant of the genus Luzula; also called glowworm-grass. The field wood-rush, Luzula campestris, is an extremely common low plant of Europe and North America, having clusters of brown chaffy flowers appearing early in spring; in Great Britain it is locally called blackhead- or cuckoo-grass and chinnys-sweeps. A larger species, L. silvatica, has the names wood-blades and wood-grass.

wood-sage (wūd'sāj), n. See sage 2.

wood-sandpiper (wūd'sand'pī-pēr), n. A common tattler of Europe and much of the Old World, Totanus glareola, of the family Scelopidae.

Wood-sandpiper (Totanus glareola).

cidae, nearly related to the redshank and green-shank, and also to the American solitary sandpiper.

wood-sanicle (wūd'san'ī-kl), n. See sanicle.

wood-saret, n. A kind of froth seen on herbs; cuckoo-spit.

The froth which they call woodsare, being like a kind of spittle, is found but upon certain herbs, . . . as lavender, . . . sage, etc. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 497.

wood-saw (wūd'sā), n. Same as buck-saw. See cuts under saw.

wood-sawyer (wūd'sā'yēr), n. In entom., same as sawyer 4.

wood-screw (wūd'skrō), n. A screw specially made for use in fastening together parts of wooden structures or structures of wood and metal. The modern wood-screw has generally a conical point, like that of a gimlet. See cuts under countersink, screw, and screw-thread.

wood-seret (wūd'sēr), n. and a. [Also wood-sere; < wood + sere 1, scar 1.] I. n. The time when there is no sap in a tree. Tusser, May's Husbandry, st. 6.

II. a. Dry; barren.

The soil . . . is a poor wood-sere land, very natural for the production of oaks especially.

Aubrey, Misc., p. 211. (Davies.)

Wood's fusible alloy. See alloy.

woodshed (wūd'shed), n. A shed for keeping wood for fuel.

She looked so much like one of Elffe's own little dolls which she had thrown into the woodshed, out of the way, that she felt ashamed. St. Nicholas, XVIII. 258.

woodshock (wūd'shok), n. [See woodchuck 1, applied to a different quadruped.] The pekan, fisher, or Pennant's marten, Mustela pennanti or M. canadensis, also called black-cat and black-fur. It is the largest and darkest-colored species of the genus, inhabiting North America approximately between 35° and 65° N. lat., in wooded regions of the country, it is from 2 to 3 feet long, the tail over a foot in length. The general color is black or blackish. See pekan, and cut under fisher.

wood-shrike (wūd'shrik), n. 1. The wood-eat. —2. An African shrike of the genus Primops.

wood-shrimp (wūd'shrimp), n. A boring or teribrant amphipod, of the family Cheluridae. See cut under Chelura.

Woodsia (wūd'zi-jī), n. [NL. (R. Brown, 1815), named after Joseph Woods, a British botanist.] A genus of delicate polypodiaceous ferns, natives of high temperate or boreal latitudes. They are tufted ferns with the stipes often jointed and separating at the joint, and round sori borne on the back of simply forked free veins. The indusium is inferior, thin, either small and open or early bursting into irregular lobes at the top. There are 15 species, of which number 7 are found in North America. See cut under indusium.

wood-skin (wūd'skin), n. A large canoe, used by the Indians of Guiana, made from the bark of the purple heart-tree and the simari or locust-tree. Some of these canoes are large enough to carry from twenty to twenty-five persons. Simmonds.

wood-slave (wūd'slāv), n. A Jamaican lizard, Mabouia agilis.

woodsman (wūd'zman), n.; pl. woodsmen (-men). One who dwells in or frequents the woods, as a wood-cutter, sportsman, hunter, or the like.

The sturdy woodsman.

J. F. Cooper, Last of Mohicans, xiv.

Things that are common to all woodsmen.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 202.

An owl and a duck will resort to the same nest-box, set up by a scheming woodsman for his own advantage.

Encyc. Brit., III. 772.

The log was white birch. . . . Woodsmen are at a loss to account for its intense and yet chaste flame, since the bark has no oily appearance.

C. D. Warner, Backlog Studies, p. 23.

Wood's metal. See metal.

wood-snail (wūd'snāl), n. A common snail of Great Britain, Helix nemoralis.

wood-snake (wūd'snāk), n. Any serpent of the family Dryophidae.

wood-snip (wūd'snip), n. 1. The European woodcock, Scelopax rusticula; so called as distinguished from the common snipe of England (Gallinago media). See first cut under woodcock. [Local, Eng.]

The wood-snip was considered a stupid bird.

St. James Gazette, March 14, 1887. (Encyc. Diet.)

2. The American woodcock, Philohela minor. See second cut under woodcock. [Virginia.]

wood-soot (wūd'sūt), n. Soot from burnt wood. It has been found useful as a manure.

Wood's operation for inguinal hernia. See operation.

wood-sorrel (wūd'sor'el), n. A plant of the genus Oxalis. The common wood-sorrel is O. acetosella. This is a low stemless species, found in damp deep shade through the north temperate zone. Its peduncles bear single delicate flowers, the petals white with light-red veins. It has the old or local names allodia, cuckoo bread, stubbard, etc., and it is regarded by some as the original Irish shamrock. The violet wood-sorrel, O. violacea, is a similar somewhat smaller American plant with violet petals, growing in less shaded ground (see cut under Oxalis). O. corniculata, the yellow wood-sorrel, having slender leafy branching stems which are erect or procumbent, with small yellow flowers, grows nearly everywhere. The leaves in this genus contain oxalic acid, and have a sourish taste. Several Mexican and South American species yield edible tubercous roots. (See oca and arracacha.) Several exotic species are cultivated in greenhouses, as O. purpurata, var. borchi, with abundant flowers of a deep rose-color, O. flava with yellow flowers, and O. versicolor with flowers exhibiting a pink exterior when closed, white within, opening only in sunshine; these are all from the Cape of Good Hope.

wood-sour (wūd'sour), n. [Also wood-sore, wood-sower.] The wood-sorrel, Oxalis acetosella; sometimes, the common barberry, Berberis vulgaris. [Prov. Eng.]

wood-spack (wūd'spak), n. Same as wood-spite. [Prov. Eng.]

wood-spirit (wūd'spīr'it), n. Same as pyroxylic spirit. See pyroxylic.

wood-spite (wūd'spīt), n. [< wood + spite, var. of spight.] The green woodpecker, Gecinus viridis. Also wood-spack. Willoughby; Ray. See cut under popinjay. [Prov. Eng.]

wood-spurge (wūd'spūrg), n. See spurge 2.

wood-stamp (wūd'stamp), n. A stamp, engraved or carved in wood, for impressing figures or colors on fabrics.

wood-star (wūd'stār), n. 1. A humming-bird of the genus Calothra, as C. calliope.—2. The Bahaman sheartail, a humming-bird, Doricha celina, common in New Providence and Andros islands. See sheartail.

wood-still (wūd'stīl), n. A turpentine-still.

wood-stone (wūd'stōn), n. Petrified wood; especially, silicified wood, such as that from Antigua, the desert of Cairo, etc.

wood-stork (wūd'stōrk), n. A stork of the subfamily Tantalina, more commonly and less correctly called wood-ibis. See cut under Tantalus.

wood-stove (wūd'stōv), n. A stove specially adapted for burning wood, as distinguished from a coal-stove, gas-stove, etc.

wood-strawberry (wūd'strā'ber-i), n. See strawberry.

woodsucker (wūd'suk'ēr), n. The green woodpecker, Geothlypis trichas. Compare sapsucker. See cut under populig. [New Forest, Eng.]

wood-swallow (wūd'swol'ō), n. The Anglo-Australian name of any bird of the family Artamidae; a swallow-shrike (which see, with cut).

wood-swift (wūd'swift), n. The moth Epialus sylvestris. See swift, 7.

woody (wūd'zī), a. [woods, pl. of wood, + -y.] Belonging to or associated with woods; peculiar to or characteristic of woods; as, a woody stream; a woody flavor. [U. S.]

Harry, Tina, Esther, and I ran up and down and in and about the piles of wood that evening with a joyous satisfaction. How fresh and spicy and woody it smelt! I can smell now the fragrance of the hickory, whose clear, oily bark in burning cast forth perfume quite equal to cinnamon. H. E. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 485.

Woody and wild and lonesome,

The swift stream wound away.

Whittier, Cobbler Keezer's Vision.

woodtapper (wūd'tap'ēr), n. A woodpecker. Also woodtapper. [Prov. Eng.]

wood-tar (wūd'tār), n. Tar obtained from wood. See tar, 1.

wood-thrush (wūd'thrush), n. 1. The mistle-thrush. [Local, Scotland].—2. In the United States, Turdus (Hylocichla) mustelinus, a beautiful thrush of a russet hue above, passing into olivaceous on the rump and tail, the under parts pure white or faintly tinged with buff on the breast, with a profusion of arrow-headed blackish spots. It is 7½ to 8 inches long, and about 13 in extent. It abounds in copses and woods of eastern parts of the United States, is an exquisite songster, and nests in bushes or low trees, laying four or five robin-blue eggs without spots, 1½ inches long by ¾ inch broad. It is migratory, breeds throughout its range, and is rather southerly, not going north of New England. It is the most strongly marked species of its subgenus. The name is sometimes extended to the several species of the same subgenus (Hylocichla), as the hermit-thrush, the olive-back the veery, and others. Also locally called wood-robin.

To her grave sylvan nooks

Thy steps allure us, which the wood-thrush hears
As maids their lovers', and no treason fears.

Lowell, To Whittier.

wood-tick (wūd'tik), n. 1. Any tick of the family Ixodidae. See Ixodidae, tick², and cut under Acarida.—2. A small insect which ticks in the woodwork of houses; the death-watch. See cut under death-watch.

wood-tin (wūd'tin), n. A nodular variety of cassiterite, or tin-stone, of a brownish color and fibrous structure, and somewhat resembling dry wood in appearance.

woodtopper (wūd'top'ēr), n. Same as wood-topper.

wood-tortoise (wūd'tōr'tis), n. See tortoise.

wood-vetch (wūd'vech), n. See vetch.

wood-vine (wūd'vin), n. The bryony.

wood-vinegar (wūd'vin-ē-jēr), n. See vinegar.

wood-violet (wūd'vi-ō-let), n. 1. Same as hedge-violet.—2. The bird's-foot violet.

wood-wagtail (wūd'wag'tāl), n. See wagtail.

woodwale (wūd'wāl), n. [Also woodwall, and formerly woodch, woodcheer; also withwall, q. v.; < ME. woodwale, woodwale (= MD. redwale, redwale = ME. redwale = MHG. ritewal, G. ritewal); wood + -wale (uncertain).] The woodhuck; a woodpecker, as the yaffle.

That all the wode above the toinge.

Thomas of Ersselbourne (Child's Ballads, l. 98).

The woodwale sang, and wold not cease,

Sitting upon the spraye.

Robin Hood and Guy of Gisborne (Child's Ballads, V. 160).

wood-walker (wūd'wā'kēr), n. A book-name of any of the gibbons, as members of the genus Hylobates.

woodwall (wūd'wāl), n. Same as woodwale.

wood-warbler (wūd'wār'blēr), n. A bird which warbles in the woods, specifically—(a) In Great Britain, the yellow willow-warbler, or wood-wren, Sylvia or Phylloscopus sibilatrix (the Sylvia sibilatrix of some authors), a small migratory species of the subfamily Sylviinae, or true warblers, common to much of Europe and northern Africa. See cut under wood-wren. (b) In the United States, a bird of the beautiful and extensive family Mniotiltidae or Dendroicae, the American warblers, as distinguished from the Old World Sylviidae; especially, a bird of the genus Dendroica, of which more than 20 species inhabit the United States. The beauty and variety of this genus are displayed to best advantage in the woodland of the eastern United States, where the numerous species are conspicuous ornaments of the forest scene. In most parts of the United States the wood-warblers are migratory birds, coming with great regularity in the spring, each in its own time, abounding for a season, and then passing on to reappear in even greater profusion during the autumn. See warbler, where all the species that have English names are defined.

woodward (wūd'wārd), n. [ME. wodeward; < wood + ward, n. Hence the surname Woodward.] A forester; a landreeve.

She [a forest] hath also her peculiar Officers, as Foresters, Verderers, Regarders, Agisters, &c. Whereas a Chase or Park hath only Keepers and Woodwards. Howell, Letters, iv. 16.

The wood-ward, who watched the forest, could claim every tree that the wind blew down.

J. R. Green, Conq. of Eng., p. 317.

Woodwardia (wūd'wār'di-ā), n. [NL. (Smith, 1790), named after Thomas J. Woodward, an English botanist.] A small genus of polypodiaceous ferns, the chain-ferns, mostly natives of northtemperate regions. They are large ferns with pinnatifid or pinnate fronds, and linear-oblong sori which are sunk in cavities of the frond, arranged in a chain-like row parallel to the midribs of the pinnae. The indusium is fixed by its outer margin to the fruiting veinlet, and covers the cavity like a lid. Of the 6 species 3 are found in North America. See also cut under sorus.

woodwardite (wūd'wārd-it), n. [Named after Dr. S. P. Woodward (1821–65).] A hydrous sulphate of copper, occurring in concretionary forms of a blue color, found in Cornwall, England.

woodwardship (wūd'wārd-shīp), n. [< woodward + -ship.] The office of woodward.

Also Mr. Hungerford has engrossed the above spoils and 60 more trees at 4½ by connivance of Mr. Inkpen, who sold him the woodwardship of that manor for 33 s.

Darrell Papers (H. Hall's Society in Elizabethan Age, [App., ii.]).

wood-wasp (wūd'wosp), n. 1. A European social wasp, or paper-wasp, Vespa sylvestris, which hangs its nest in a tree.—2. A wasp which burrows in wood, as certain species of Crabronidae. The female, by means of her strong broad mandibles, excavates cells in the sand or in rotten timber, in which she deposits her eggs, with larvae or insects as food for her progeny when hatched. These insects are extremely active in their habits, and fond of the nectar of flowers. The larger species are marked with yellow rings, while those of the smaller are generally black. See cut under Crabron.

3. A hornet; any member of the Uroceridae (or Siricidae), the larvae of all of which are wood-borers; a tailed wasp, as Urocerus or Sirix gigas.

wood-wax (wūd'waks), n. [Also wood-waxen, and woodwaxen (simulating wood): < ME. wode-waxe, < AS. woodwaxe, < wudu, wood, + wear, wax (t.).] Same as woodwaxen.

wood-waxen (wūd'wak'sn), n. Same as wood-wax.

woodweelet, woodwelet, n. Obsolete forms of woodwale.

woodwidgeon (wūd'wij'gūn), n. See widgion, 2 (c.).

wood-wool (wūd'wūl), n. Fine shavings made from pine wood, specially prepared and used as a surgical dressing.

woodwork (wūd'wōrk), n. Objects, or parts of objects, made of wood; that which is produced by the carpenters' or joiners' art; generally applied to details rather than to complete structures: as, the woodwork of a house (that is, the inner fittings, etc.).

A young man has some reason to be displeased when he finds the girl of his heart hand in hand with another young gentleman in an occult and shady recess of the wood-work of Brighton Pier. Thackeray, Philip, xiv.

The rich painting of the wood-work was beginning to fade. B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 128.

woodworker (wūd'wēr'kēr), n. 1. A worker in wood, as a carpenter, joiner, or cabinet-maker.—2. A power-machine for jointing, molding, squaring, and facing wood. It is made adjustable, and has various attachments for work of different kinds.—Universal woodworker, a combination machine for working in wood, so made that the two sides can work independently or in concert, as may be desired. Such machines are adapted for a great variety of work, as chamfering, graining, tenoning, crosscutting, and mitering. E. H. Knight.

wood-worm (wūd'wēm), n. A worm, grub, or larva that is bred in wood.

woodwose, n. [Also, corruptly, woodhouse; < ME. wodewose, wodewose, wodewese, woodwyse, woryse; < AS. wodewāsa, a man of the woods, a faun or satyr, < wudu, wood, + wāsa*, prob. 'a being,' < wesan, dial. wosan, be: see was.] A wild man of the woods; a satyr or faun. Representations of woodwoses often appear in heraldry as supporters.

Wodeos, that woned in the kuarreg [rocks]. Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 721.

In he schokkes his schelde, schountes he no lengare; Bot alles unwyse wodewose he wente at the gayneste.

Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 3518.

Some like brute beasts grazed upon the ground, some went naked, some roamed like woodwoses.

Sir T. Wilson (Arber's Eng. Garner, l. 464).

wood-wren (wūd'wren), n. 1. Either one of two small woodland birds of Europe, belonging to the subfamily Sylviinae. (a) The willow-warbler or willow-wren, Phylloscopus trochilus. (b) The true wood-warbler, or yellow willow-wren, Phylloscopus sibilatrix:

Yellow Wood-wren (Phylloscopus sibilatrix).

the preferable use of the name. The two species, though quite distinct, are much alike and often confounded. Neither is a wren in a proper sense.

24. A supposed species of the true wren, described by Audubon in 1834 as Troglodytes americanus, but not different from the common house-wren of the United States.

wood-wroth (wūd'wōth), a. Angry to the extent of madness. [Scotch.]

When he saw his dear heart's blood,
A' wood-wroth waxed he.

Lord Thomas and Fair Annet (Allingham's Ballad-Book).

woodwyset, n. See woodwose.

woody (wūd'ī), a. [Early mod. E. also woodie, woody; < ME. wody, wod, woody; < wood + -y.] 1. Abounding with wood; wooded; as, woody land; a woody region.

It is all woody, but by the Sea side Southward there are sands like dunes.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, II. 277.

Off in glimmering bowers and glades
He met her, and in secret shades
Of woeher Ida's inmost grove.

Milton, Il Penseroso, l. 29.

A slanting ray lingered on the woody crests of the precipices that overhung some parts of the river, giving greater depth to the dark-gray and purple of their rocky sides.

Ireing, Sketch-Book, p. 438.

2. Pertaining or belonging to the woods; dwelling or situated in the woods; peculiar to a wood or forest; sylvan; woodland; woody.

All the Satyres scorn their woody kind.

Spenser, F. Q., l. vi. 18.

The Brachmanes, which he in his Indian travels had found in a woodie solitariness.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 367.

3. Consisting of or containing wood; ligneous; as, the woody parts of plants.

Herbs are those plants whose stalks are soft, and have nothing woody in them, as grass, sowthistle, and hemlock.

Locke, Elem. of Nat. Philos., ix.

4. Peculiar to or characteristic of wood: as, a woody scent or flavor.—Glandular woody fiber.

See glandular.—Woody fiber, the fiber of wood. See vegetable fibers (under fiber), wool-cell, and woody tissue, below.—Woody layers. See layer.—Woody mullen¹, the Jerusalem sage, Phlomis frutescens.

Verbesco, wooll-blade, torche-herbe, lung-woort, hares-beard, french-sage, ligttaper, or wooddi-mullen. Florio.
Woody nightshade. See nightshade, 1 (a).—Woody stem, in bot., a stem of a hard or woody nature, which lasts for many years, as the trunks of trees.—Woody tissue, in bot., vegetable tissue composed chiefly of wood-cells. See wood-cell and tissue, 4.

woor (wō'ér), n. [Early mod. E. also wooter; < ME. woore, woore, woore, woore, < AS. wōgere, a wooer, < wōgian, woo; see wool.] One who woos. (a) One who courts or solicits in love; a suitor.

"By my feith, frece," quod I, "se faren like these woorers That welde none wydweas but forto welde here godis."

Piers Plowman (B), xl. 71.

I'll mark no words that smooth-faced woorers say.

(bt) One who promotes the marriage of another; a match-maker.

Woorar, or he that woythe for another. Pronuba, paraimphus. Prompt. Parv., p. 533.

woof (wōf), n. [Altered, by initial conformity with weave, weft, web, from aaf. < ME. aaf, < AS. āwef, āwef, āwef, contr. to āb, woof, < āwefan in pp. āwefan, weave, < ā + wefan, weave; see a-1 and weave.] 1. The thread that is carried by the shuttle and is woven into the warp by being passed back and forth through successive sheds, or partings made in the warp or lengthwise threads by the action of heddles; the threads that run from side to side of a web; the weft.

The placing of the tangible parts in length or transverse, as in the warp and the woof of textile, is more inward or more outward. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

2. Texture; cloth; as, a pall of softest woof.

There was an awful rainbow once in heaven:

We know her woof, her texture: she is given

In the dull catalogue of common things.

Keats, Lamia, ii.

His movements were watched by hundreds of natives, . . . an exceedingly tall race, almost naked, . . . the women encircled with a woof of painted feathers or a deerskin apron. Bancroft, Hist. U. S., 1. 34.

woofy (wō'fī), a. [< woof + -y.] Having a close texture; dense; as, a woofy cloud. J. Baillie.

woohoo (wō'hō'), n. The sail-fish: same as *boohoo*² (where see ent).

woolyly (wō'ing-lī), adv. In a wooing manner; enticingly; with persuasiveness.
